This fall, the Calvin Theatre, Iron Horse Music Hall and Pearl Street Nightclub will bring students from the five colleges and surrounding communities a diverse concert lineup. All three of these Northampton venues have brought thousands of college students and adults magnificent shows for years now. In the next few months, artists like Ryan Adams, Bruce Hornsby, Rane, Public Enemy, Joan Osborne and Alix Olson are just some of the entertainers who will be rocking the trio of stages.

CALVIN THEATRE

Bruce Hornsby and his band, featuring Steve Kimock, kicked off the Calvin Theatre lineup last Saturday. Grammy winner Hornsby brought his unique sound to Northampton for one night as part of his tour, which promotes his new album Big Swing Face. Allowing his fans to see a new side to him, the album features some great guitar solos.

Singer and songwriter Ryan Adams will also make his way to the Calvin Theatre on Oct. 7, as he too is scheduled for a one-night engagement. Opening for Adams is the group Tegan and Sara, sisters from Canada. For those who are not already familiar with Ryan Adams, his second album Gold has received a good amount of radio play all across America. Songs like "New York, New York" and "Heartbreaker" are just two of the songs that have turned Adams into a well-known artist. The show starts at 8 p.m. and tickets range from $25 to $35.

Other artists coming to the Calvin Theatre include Chuck Berry on Friday Sept. 27 (tickets range from $35 to $55) to Aimee Mann on Wednesday Oct. 2

Mixed feelings towards new hip-hop album

JURASSIC 5
Power In Numbers
Interscope Records

As a hip-hop group, Jurassic 5 is one of the most talented and versatile acts in popular music today. This has already been proven with the LA-based group's two previous releases, EP and Quality Control. Their constant rhythm and tone variation among their four rappers (Chali 2Na, Zaakir, Akil and Marc 7) form complex schemes that never seem to lose their edge and always manage to assault the senses. Additionally, their raw, jazzy sampling gives them a tinge of funk that most rap has been missing ever since the genre achieved mainstream commercial success. With their new release, Power In Numbers, Jurassic 5 makes a strong effort towards increasing the variation in their sound in nearly every way possible. Whether it is the rhyme schemes, the sampling, the speed, or the content, the tones and moods of the album are in constant change.

The LP commences with "This Is," a brief jazz prelude that features a shout-out from Sista Sadiah of the original Wailers, and leads into the melodic, bluesy track "Freedom." The rawness of the delta blues guitar and vocal sampling provides for an intensely passionate backdrop to the tune's socially conscious lyrics. It is as edgy as it is illuminating and immediately engages the listener. The group then eases into the calm, flute infused "If You Only Knew," a chronicling of the band's rugged road to the top that retains a certain level of humility, something very hard to find in popular music right now. What makes this song stand out is the shuffling and simple but multi-layered chorus, which helps tie everything together after long periods that are filled with the group's complex rhythm changes. I-5 does not dwell on this for long, and the group soon dives into the upbeat, heavy bass thumbing of "A Day At The Races," an adrenaline rush, and without a question, the most intense song on the album.

After this small pinnacle, the excitement level soon dives down into the sedated "Hey." A tune of pure hedonism, the slowed down rapping and missy melodies sends one into space, only to be smacked in the face by "What's Golden." Flanked by a fat driving bass synthesizer track and a section of flourishing trumpets, this is the most rocking tune on the album and probably has the highest potential to be a hit single. However, the energy level soon settles once again, as the group shows some intimate vulnerability with the reflective "Thin Line," an account of sexual frustration between friends featuring the sugary harmonies of Nelly Furtado bearing striking contest with Chali 2Na's bass vocals. While this has some of the best lyrics on the album, the melody is almost downright poppy. The album comes to a close with "High Fidelity," a song that probably is the closest to resembling the rawness of their older material, and "Acetate Prophets" a five-minute techno-jazz exploration.

For an album to be truly good, it requires balance. Power In Numbers has an abundance of this quality. However, it lacks a bit of the edge of their earlier work, and if it were not for the constant changes, the album would make less of an impact. The softer tunes are a nice change, and it is great to see that I-5 have the interest of growing as artists, but by taking these risks the record as a result has a couple of weaknesses. "Hey" and "Thin Line" become less interesting over time. Additionally, "Acetate Prophets" almost fails in sparking an interest, and weakens the impact of the better songs on the album by being the last track. While it has some great songs on it and is still worth buying, by the time one has finished Power In Numbers, the feeling of excitement that is felt after EP and Quality Control is not there. Revered actor/author in Amherst

John Lithgow attends book signing in town

JAMES SCHAEFER/COLLEGIAN

Reid Davenport
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

AMHERST – From "3rd Rock to the Sun" to "Harry and the Hendersons," John Lithgow has entertained people of all ages for years. Now, as an author of children's books, he personally greeted his mostly 3-foot tall fans at the Jeffery Amherst Bookstore yesterday. There was not a single frown in the whole line as children, parents, grandparents and teenagers stood in line to meet the actor/writer/musician.

"Everyone at my work simply loves John Lithgow," said a woman patiently waiting at the very end of the line. "He writes such marvelous stories for young children and he's so funny on TV."

Lithgow has written three children's books, two of which contain audio CDs that he has recorded. His first book, The Remarkable Farkle McBride, is a story about a young boy who masters an instrument in each section of the orchestra's four sections until he finally realizes that all he simply wants is to be a conductor. His second book is Marsupial Sue, which is about learning how to accept yourself for who you are. His most recent release, Micavibre, is about a squirrel that goes to an art museum and decides that he wants to paint. All of them are very easy for kids to read and keep them well entertained. Both The Remarkable Farkle McBride and Marsupial Sue are New York Times Best-Sellers.

"I like John Lithgow and my daughter likes books," said the father just in front of me. "It's good for me and my daughter Jenny. A little something for me and a little something for her."

About 45 minutes into the signing, as classes got out, kids, parents and grandparents were not the only ones waiting in line. Some students from the University of Massachusetts began to arrive, and one in particular had an interesting proposition for Mr. Lithgow.

"I'm here to attempt to get Mr. Lithgow to come to our try-outs for Active Ingredients Sunday night," said UMass sophomore Sean Sullivan. After greeting Lithgow, Sullivan seemed a bit let down, jokingly saying that "Yeah, I gave him the invite. We'll be wishing and praying, and wishing, and praying, and most importantly wishing."

Mr. Lithgow's parents, who live in Amherst, are frequent customers of the Jeffery Amherst Bookstore and were asked to have their son do a book signing. Sure, enough, everything pulled through quite nicely.

"We're so happy to have him and have such a nice turn out," store-owner Harold said. "We normally just get college professors signing their books, but a star like John is a rare occasion."

Even as he began to sign books that were put on order for him to personalize, he was more than willing to answer my questions.

"I've written three books in three years along with my TV shows and movies in between," said Lithgow. "It was definitely a good turn out, seeing as how I'm still left with more books to sign."

As for future projects he said, "Well acting is just my day job, but I have another book coming out next September and I've written a ballet that's going to be performed by the New York City Ballet and I love doing things for kids because they are so much easier to entertain than grown-ups."

(tickets begin at $22.50 and go to $35).

Lily Tomlin will perform for one night on Saturday Oct. 5. While tickets for this show are a little more expensive than some of the other shows at the Calvin this fall (ranging from $37.50 to $55), Tomlin is worth the extra money.

Richard Thompson will also play the night. Tickets for this show range from $25 to $35.

The Disco Biscuits will play the first show at the Calvin Theatre in November, on Nov. 3. Tickets cost $20. To round up the fall lineup for the Calvin Theatre, Natalie MacMaster will perform on Saturday Nov. 23. Tickets range from $20 to $32.50.

IRON HORSE MUSIC HALL

An array of performers have already taken to the stage at The Iron Horse Music Hall, Seven Nations to Branford Marsalis to Alix Olson, the 1999 Outwrite National Slam award winner.

Uncle Sammy will play on Friday Oct. 18. Tickets cost $8.

On Wednesday Nov. 13, Paul Brady will take the Iron Horse stage. Tickets for the show cost $16.50. Born and raised in Northern Ireland, Brady is touring to promote his new album Oh What A World.

Dave Mallett will perform Sunday Dec. 15. Tickets are $15. With 11 albums to his name, Mallett has a broad discography to draw from.

PEARL STREET NIGHTCLUB

Pearl Street Nightclub began their fall events with Addison Groove Project on Friday Sept. 13. All Mighty Sentaors accompanied the group.

The next week, Percy Hill with the John Butler Trio brought their flavor to Northampton on Thursday Sept. 19. The guys who make up Percy Hill (Nathan Wilson, Aaron Katz, Joseph Farrell and John Leccese) have had a strong following in the surrounding area for the last couple of years.

Last Monday, Public Enemy (plus Telekinetic Kat with the Fortunetellas) performed. Putting on one of the best shows of the fall, Public Enemy consists of rap legends. There sound has been going strong now for over 15 years.

Tonight, Ivan Osborne will take the Pearl Street Nightclub stage. Willy King and The Liberators will open for Osborne. Tickets are $17.50.

Soulive will perform next week on Thursday Oct. 24. Tickets cost $18.50.

Galactic will be playing on Tuesday Nov. 19. Tickets are priced at $14.

the Grammy award-winning Supernatural three years ago, Santana hopes the magic will continue with his follow-up, Shaman. The 60s survivor may include collaborations with a wide range of artists, including Pavarotti, P.O.D and Dido. Rob Thomas (who helped make Santana's "Smooth" a huge hit) and Wyclef Jean wrote some songs for the album. (10/22)

Christina Aguilera, Stripped – Instead of rushing a release after her multi-platinum self-titled debut, golden-piped Aguilera instead opted to release Christmas and Spanish-language albums and earned another huge hit with "Lady Marmalade," last year's theme to Moulin Rouge. Expect raunchy material from the sexually-provocative Aguilera on Stripped. (10/29)

Tori Amos, Scarlet's Walk – As Tori Amos trudged on her autumn tour last year she observed the recovery from the Sept. 11 tragedy. The introspective one used that material as her subject for Scarlet's Walk, where Amos plays Scarlet and tries to make sense of the devastation. The CD will include "Scarlet's Web," an enhanced feature that maps out the protagonist's trip. (10/29)

Nick Carter, Now or Never – Looks like he's making good use of the album's title. Although 'N Syncer Justin Timberlake's highly anticipated debut solo album has generated much buzz, Nick Carter, of boy band rival Backstreet Boys, will release his CD before Timberlake. Actually, the title refers to Carter's decision of moving on with the Backstreet Boys and branching out on his own. The album lacks collaborations with any artists (unlike Timberlake's) and integrates rock into box-band pop. (10/29)

NOVEMBER

Whitney Houston, Just Whitney – Since releasing her last studio album, 1998's My Love is Your Love, Houston's been aggressively pursued by the tabloids for her erratic behavior, including a bit back in August with the media-bashing "Whatchulookinat," a song that faltered on the charts and post-poned the release of the album from last September to its tentative date in November. Houston is hoping the song was a fluke. The CD boasts producers She'kspere (Mariah Carey), Rob Fusari (Destiny's Child) and Kenneth "Babyface" Edmonds. (11/5)

The Wallflowers, Red Letter Days – On the fourth studio album, The Wallflowers decided to be optimistic in these rather negative times. Although singer-guitarist Jacob Dylan is back on board for Red Letter Days, guitarist Michael Ward left last year due to creative and personal differences. Former Wallflower Tobi Miller is picking up the slack. (11/5)

Justin Timberlake, Justified – Expect a collaboration-heavy solo debut album from 'N Syncer Justin Timberlake on Justified. A number of R&B artists including Michael Jackson, Stevie Wonder, Prince, Aaliyah and Missy Elliott have influenced his sound. Studio wizards the Neptunes and Timbaland split most of the production duties for the record, with Brian McKnight producing one song. Guest vocalists Janet Jackson and Bubba Sparxx will also appear on the production. (11/5)

Missy Elliott, still untitled – The always Supa Dupa Fly Missy "Misdemeanor" Elliott returns with fellow Supa Dupa Fly producer Timbaland for another freaky-deaky collaboration. Timbaland will be mixing his trademark slinky, bass-heavy beats with old-skool samples while Elliott's rhymes reflect on hip-hop past, present and future. With collaborations with Method Man, Beyonce Knowles, Jay-Z and Ludacris, expect Elliott's latest to be another hit. (11/12)

TLC, 3-D – TLC's first album since the fateful death of Lisa "Left Eye" Lopes will serve as a tribute to the late singer. Since Lopes hadn't finished her parts for the album before her fatal car accident in April, the disc was filled out with unused vocals from her solo projects. Reports have said that this will likely be the final album recorded under the TLC name. (11/12)

Nas, God's Son – Capricious rapper Nas returns with God's Son, ready to take aim at new targets. "I'll Be Pledge (Remix)," a recent collaboration with Ja Rule, created an uprising of smoke as he took shots at Snoop Dogg and DMX. Murder Inc. honcho Irv Gotti is executive-producing the album. (11/19)

O-Town, O2 – O-Town hope their latest album helps them brake out of the mold of the "boy-band" prototype. Although the record will remain in the pop realm, a rock feel is also being infused. O2 will also contain "Favorite Girl," a track produced and co-written by Nelly. (11/19)

Shania Twain, Up! – The queen of country-pop crossover is ready for a return. Twain's last album 1997's Come on Over, sold a whopping 19 million copies in the U.S. alone, tying it for the sixth biggest album in American music history. For the past two years, Twain and her husband/producer John "Mutt" Lange, had a baby and were working on Twain's next studio effort. Making good on its title, the album is expected to be upbeat and cheery. (11/19, although rumors have swirled that the album may be bumped to next year)

DECEMBER

Mariah Carey – For her first post-meltdown album on her new label, Mariah Carey has reunited with Jimmy Jam and Terry Lewis and Jermaine Dupri. The album will be released off of her newly designed record label, a branch off of Island Def Jam. (12/10)

Jennifer Lopez, still untitled – J. "Big Booty" Lo is hurriedly recording a new album in hopes of releasing it before the always-healthy holidas season. With a split from ex-hubbs Chris Judd and a recent dalliance with Ben Affleck, she certainly has enough material to sing about. (Tentatively set for Dec.)

In addition to the above releases, a number of other high-profile acts will be releasing discs in time for the lucrative Christmas shopping season. So far solo efforts from the members of Destiny's Child have floundered, with the exception of Kelly Rowland's duet on Nelly's "Hot in Herre." Now we'll see if Rowland can break the curse with Simply Deep. (10/22).

Boombastic rapper Shaggy hopes to strike a Lucky Day (10/29) with his follow-up to Hotshot.

Jay-Z's The Blueprint 2: The Gift & The Curse (11/5), said to contain rock guitar riffs, is foreseen to be much grittier than his previous efforts.

Brooklyn-bred rapper Fabolous hopes his dreams are realized with the release of his sophomore release Street Dreams (11/12), which will feature songs about how he's living with his newfound success.

Monica's All Eyez on Me (11/19) was scheduled for a Sept. release but was pushed back to Nov. probably due to the lack of steam from the Michael Jackson sampled first hit "All Eyez on Me." Hoping to secure all eves she can, Monica tand her record label, J) hopes the delay helps her cause.

Canadian punkers Sum 41 are following up last year's All Killer No Filler with a still untitled (11/26) record that reportedly has a heavier sound.

Those Beatles start saving up that extra cash now.

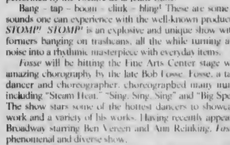
Puccini's La Bohème is a popular opera full of passionate music. Based on the musical RENT, currently running on Broadway, La Bohème is sung in Italian but is accompanied with subtitles creatively presented by the Fine Arts Center.

"To be or not to be: that is the question." Yes, Hamlet the play full of love, envy, murder, madness and betrayal will be performed by the Theatre de la Jeune Lune.



Bang – tap – boom – clink – bling! These are some of the sounds one can experience with the well-known production of STOMP! STOMP! is an explosive and unique show with performers banging on trashcans, all the while turning altering noise into a rhythmic masterpiece with everyday items.

Fosse will be hitting the Fine Arts Center stage with its amazing choreography, by the late Bob Fosse. Fosse, a talented dancer and choreographer, choreographed many numbers, including "Steam Heat," "Sing, Sing, Sing" and "Big Spender." The show stars some of the hottest dancers to showcase his work and a variety of his works. Having recently appeared on Broadway starring Ben Vereen and Ann Reinking, Fosse is a phenomenal and diverse show.

Last, it's the first season of theater is Cirque Eloize. Cirque Eloize, a Canadian Circus Company, will capture one's eyes with amazing performance sights and one's ears with lyrical and mysterious music. Here at UMass, Cirque Eloize will debut its latest production Nomade, which includes a festive celebration of song, dance and circus performance.

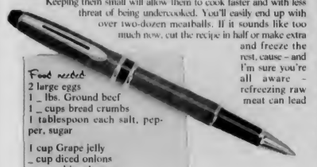
MICROLOGY



Dedicated to the subtle science of microwave cookery in all its forms and varients

WITH JESSICA PELLETIER

Ever notice how some things are better the next day? Cold pizza, 24-hour flu, almost anything abiding the retched aftershocks of a drinking binge grows better over time. The same thing goes for this week's recipe. These sweet and spicy meatballs are infinitely better the morning after. And since it's football season right now, I figured red meat deserved center stage. (I apologize to any vegans or vegetarians who may be offended by my enjoyment of cooking something which may be morally offensive or ickily unhealthy to them; I'll make up for it in the future, I promise.)

Scene I. Enter ground chuck, stage left. If you have any reservations about touching raw bits of moo, you can stuff it into a large Ziploc bag and knead it instead. Gather a pound and a half of ground beef, two large eggs, a cup and a half of dry breadcrumbs, one tablespoon of salt, pepper, sugar and mush it into next weekend. The resulting mixture will have the ability to be formed into spheres, which hold their shape without cracking into tiny bits. The quality of the meat used is irrelevant. Ground sirloin has the tendency to be more expensive because it contains less fat. Unfortunately, this also means less flavor, and why waste the money, when the end results are the same?

Begin to roll the meats goodness into globes one inch in diameter. Keeping them small will allow them to cook faster and with less threat of being undercooked. You'll easily end up with over two-dozen meatballs. If it sounds like too much now, cut the recipe in half or make extra and freeze the rest, cause – and I'm sure you're all aware – refreezing raw meat can lead to horrific illnesses that'll make your intestines want to swear off meat and process nothing but lukewarm gruel for the rest of their twisted lives. Stacking isn't generally advised either, because there will only be enough sauce to cover one layer and the breakdown of fats during cooking could cause breakage and leave you with a bowl full of soggy meat paste.

Food needed:
2 large eggs
1 _ lbs. Ground beef
1 _ cups bread crumbs
1 tablespoon each salt, pepper, sugar
1 cup Grape jelly _ cup diced onions
_ cup white vinegar
4 Tblsp. chili powder
1 Tblsp. Each garlic powder, white pepper, paprika

The second part of this recipe involves one of the most delectable sauces ever to cross the threshold of one's palate. Scene II. Enter grape jelly, stage right. Although raw meat and breakfast spreads don't have a warm history together, the sugar and corn syrup from the jelly breaks down during cooking and soaks into the meaty balls, making them sweet and tender. All grape flavor is somehow lost in the process of cooking, which is perfectly fine considering fruit flavored beef just hasn't made it into mainstream cooking yet. Jam is a thicker preserve, which is traditionally supposed to contain more bits of fruit, so in this case, it isn't strongly recommended.

In your microwave safe bowl, add one cup grape jelly, a quarter cup diced onions, three-quarters of a cup of white vinegar, four tablespoons chili powder, and one teaspoon each garlic powder, white pepper, and paprika. If all the chili sauce ingredients are hard to come by, you can purchase premade chili sauce in the condiment isle of the supermarket. You'll still be left with tiny chunks of jelly swirling in the mixture, but the intense heat will cause them to break down like Mariah Carey in a downward career spiral.

Pour sauce over a single layer of meatballs in a microwave safe dish and cook for 15 minutes on full power. Once the process is finished, all the fat from cooking will have drained from the meat and into the sauce. Unless you'd enjoy putting all those lovely lipids in your system, skim them off using a paper towel or refrigerate overnight to allow the fats to collect and harden on the surface of the food. Leaving the fat floating in the sauce will give you the impression of eating the greasy innards of a Hot Pocket. After the fat has hardened, you can scrape it off with a spoon and trash it. (And don't make a face; the same fat collects in your arteries with every fast food french fry you consume.)

In the end, you'll be left with meatballs so soft, they barely need chewing; I kid you not. Baking something in it's own juices causes the fat to be released and the flavor of whatever sauce you use to replace it, so even if you make these things with barbeque sauce they'll taste great. It's getting cold outside and these beef bits pack enough spice to warm you up without causing your mouth to go into meltdown.

weapon. Basically if you enjoy films with stuff blowing up and lots of scantily clad women, this is the fall movie pick for you. Look for Madonna to make a cameo as a fencing instructor.

Number 8: Spirited Away
The first Japanese animated film to hit the U.S. box office in years, Hiyo Miyazaki's Spirited Away looks to be a cinematic adventure worth the wait. Winner of the Best Film of the Year at the Berlin International Film Festival and the Audience Choice Award at the San Francisco Film Festival, Spirited Away looks reminiscent of the mysterious ambiance of Miyazaki's 1997 release Princess Mononoke. Spirited Away relates the story of a young girl named Chihiro and her quest to save her parents. Helped along the way by a strange boy named Haku (the voice of Jason Marsden) and a slew of other intriguing characters, Chihiro travels though "worlds seen and unseen" to regain what she has lost. She must rely on her judgment, courage and loyalty and "above all else," remember her name. Spirited Away looks like it will be Disney's cinematic adventure and success this fall.

Number 7: Treasure Planet
The preview opens with low, mysterious music as the camera approaches an apparent quarter moon in the distance. Just as the audience is about to write off the experience as a viewing of a Dream Works advertisement, the camera centers in to reveal that the 'moon' is actually a futuristic city abuzz with sea ship-style spacecrafts. Then bam! The music intensifies to an adventure theme to rival any composer-John-Williams-classic, and the screen switches to a sky-surfing Jim Hawkins sailing over the city and through the clouds. Its intensity builds as city scenes flash across the screen, showing animation drawn in a partially futuristic and partially 18th century traditional style. Based on Robert Louis Stevenson's "Treasure Island," Treasure Planet just might be the Disney animated feature fans have been waiting for since Mulan—or even further back—for the film is directed by the team who created The Little Mermaid and Aladdin. Perhaps an eager audience missing those Disney days of musicals, and nothing but musicals may also be appeased, as the character of Jim Hawkins is credited with both a "speaking" and "singing" voice – speaking credit to Joseph Gordon-Levitt and singing voice as Goo Goo Dolls Johnny Rzeznik.

Number 6: Phone Booth
Phone Booth could prove to be the surprise of the fall movie releases. It stars Colin Farrell as a sleazy publicist who uses a phone booth to call his mistress because his wife checks his cell phone bills. One afternoon while using the pay phone, Farrell's character receives a call from someone who informs him that if he leaves the booth he will be shot. Kiefer Sutherland is terrifying as the voice, and look for "Dawson's Creek" babe Katie Holmes as the mistress.

Number 5: Focus
Although not receiving heavy publicity, based on early gathered information, Focus is making a name for itself as being a major screen event. Based on Arthur Miller's controversial novel, Focus is a story about what it is like to have the way you see the world radically shifted by how others see you. It's a story of mistaken identity. William H. Macy stars in the role of Lawrence Newman while Laura Dern stars as his outspoken self. Focus opens Oct. 12.

Number 4: Rules of Attraction
I think the only reason this movie is [illegible] high on the list is because of its thought provoking movie poster involving teddy bears participating in sexual acts. James Van Der Beek stars as a drug dealer/student at Camden College in New Jersey. He [illegible] a boodle of money to another drug dealer played by Clifton Collins Jr., and copes with this by sleeping with as many women as possible. In reading the summaries it [illegible] a giant love triangle-orgy, but [illegible] always a recipe for some entertainment.

Number 3: 8 Mile
8 Mile is probably one the most [illegible] movies of the next few months. [illegible] Eminem, Brittany Murphy and [illegible] 8 Mile is seemingly an autobiographical account of Eminem's own life [illegible] through rapper "Bunny Rabbit." According to rumors, 8 Mile is a [illegible] hip-hop film, but doesn't shed any [illegible] into Eminem's bizarre life than [illegible] Elvis movies did for Elvis.

Number 2: Red Dragon
This is another highly anticipated [illegible] Red Dragon is the prequel to [illegible] Lambs. Anthony Hopkins [illegible] Hannibal Lector and Edward Norton [illegible] former FBI agent Will Graham [illegible] dies in the pursuit of Lector. [illegible] being said about the script to the [illegible] the trailer doesn't give much [illegible] bound to be a seriously scary thriller, [illegible] for the Halloween season. Red Dragon [illegible] Oct. 4.

Number 1: Harry Potter and the Chamber of Secrets
"Mr. Potter will always be around [illegible] day," says a sinister-looking Lucius Malfoy in the latest trailer for the film [illegible] icated to the second book in the [illegible] acclaimed "Harry Potter" [illegible] worry. I will be," replies Harry [illegible] much-aged-since-his-last-screen-[illegible] Daniel Radcliffe). And indeed [illegible] Potter comes back to the silver [illegible] November with all the old [illegible] first movie and a slew of [illegible] including Dobby the House [illegible] father Lucious and the [illegible] Gilderoy Lockheart (Kenneth [illegible] movie trailers already give the [illegible] hope, showing glimpses of [illegible] from the book—ranging from [illegible] bowler to a flying car. Once [illegible] direction of Chris Columbus [illegible] sure to delight audiences as much [illegible] runner, if not more.

tage of that," Shea said. "Emotionally, we dropped down, because we didn't know if we would get another opportunity. You have got to believe the opportunity will come."

The last 25 minutes of the first half was highlighted by an incredible Crimson attack. The first strike was at 15:11 mark, when Mina Pell tapped in a rebound off a corner attempt for the Crimson.

After numerous failed corners, Harvard came streaking down the field as Elizabeth Andrews put away their second goal at 23:14 mark. Pell and Jen Ahn assisted Andrews' goal.

Nearing the end of the half, the Crimson wasn't done yet. With less than two minutes left before halftime, Philomena Gambale sneaked one passed UMass goalie Ashley Egland. The goal gave Harvard a big 3-0 lead by the break, and things were only looking dim for the Minutewomen.

The Maroon and White has struggled around its net, by creating a lot of corner opportunities for its opponent. The first half was no exception as UMass gave 10 corners, but Ashley Egland kept her team in the contest with some great saves on many should-be goals.

"She's been doing a good job," Shea said. "She been doing exactly what her job, stop the save-able shots. We need to help her down there and clear out some balls."

In the second half, the Minutewomen played like a completely different team. The entire half was a back and forth possession battle as neither would give up any ground. The Maroon and White had three close attempts that all easily could have been goals. The UMass defense also stepped up and cut the shots margin sufficiently less than the first half.

Katie McDavitt scored the lone goal of the half, giving the Crimson the 4-0 win. McDavitt and Pell each had a goal and an assist in the contest, as Zacartian put off the shutout in her return to Amherst.

"I think we took a giant step forward. We need to keep going forward and continue to play like we did in the second half," Shea said. "The players are starting to see where the angles are and where the passes are. We had some great individual efforts tonight."

This Saturday, the Minutewomen will host a similar team in University of Connecticut at 1 p.m. Lauren Henderson and Kelly Cochrane, one of the best offensive duos in the Big East, lead the Huskies. Henderson is among the Big East leaders in goals scored with eight, as Cochrane is the best playmaker with seven assists, mostly to Henderson. With Cochrane and Henderson on the field together, a goal is always a possibility.

UConn is off to a fair start with a 4-5 record (1-0 Big East). In their last game, the Huskies pulled off the 3-1 win over Brown. If the Minutewomen play like they did in the second half, they have chance to pull off their first win of the season over the Huskies.

GERALD LYNCH/COLLEGIAN

Senior Sarah Bohonowicz has taken four of her team's 52 shots this season. The Maroon and White's opponents have taken 132 shots.

The Dialogue on Faith and Reason

(2) UMass faculty and (1) grad student host an open hour of discussion, addressing topics like:

Are faith and reason contradictory?

How much can we know about religious claims anyway?

Has anyone messed with the Bible since it was originally written?

If God is loving & just, why does He permit evil?

If some say Jesus is "the only way," what about people in other religions?

In a university devoted to inquiry, is it a good idea to exclude spiritual views from the classroom?

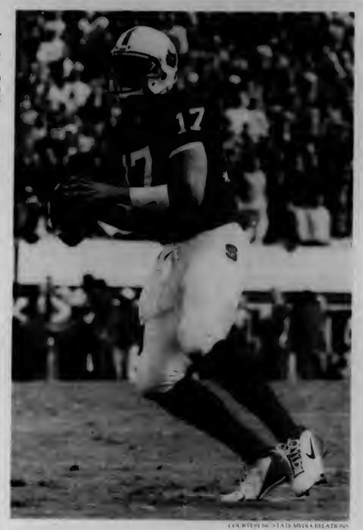
Additionally, facing off against someone like Rivers can show the Minutemen how good they can be against the pass. Quarterbacks like Jake Eaton (Maine) and Brett Gordon (Villanova) are scheduled to visit Amherst in the next month, and while they are strong players, they are nothing compared to someone of Rivers's skill level.

"I think the other teams at I-AA haven't faced a team with a quarterback of [Rivers's] ability," UMass Head Coach Mark Whipple said. "You just hope the guy's going to pull the trigger and make a couple of mistakes."

As for N.C. State, playing the game has its advantages as well. With as rigorous a schedule as ACC teams play, a week against a team outside of I-A can provide time to work on things for the stretch run into the bowl season.



"They play us for the same reason we play AIC and Central Connecticut," Whipple said. "They get a home game, give us a little money and make a million dollars. They get a week off before they play North Carolina, so they can play some new guys."

While the Wolfpack is an esteemed opponent, a team in such a power conference often is a good choice because of the amount of revenue it can give out without the bat of an eye.

"Typically the guarantee is related to the I-A team's ability to draw fans and generate revenue, so usually the teams with strong fan bases, and in larger conferences will pay the most," McGaw said.

With the potential for revenue generation and the possibility of heightening the team's ability, the benefits of playing a Div. I-A school are obvious. And for the Minutemen, they have nothing to lose when they go down to Raleigh this weekend, as it likely will be regarded as a success if the Maroon and White keep the Wolfpack within 30 points. And for Whipple and his squad, it is certainly a situation where it will take an awful lot to look bad in the public's eye.

"We lost to Marshall by 29 last year and you all thought I was a genius."

ing completions record (33) in the game, and came within two yards from the passing yardage record (401).

While there are match-up concerns all across the field for the Minutemen this weekend, one position that Whipple isn't too concerned about is his receiving core, especially his star receiver.

"I think [Adrian] Zullo can play anywhere [in the country]," Whipple said.

As for young receiver Joe Bruce, "He's coming along. I thought he played well [against Northeastern."

But Krohn must have time to find Zullo, Bruce, DeShon Hardy (three touchdowns in three game), and Neal Brown, as the offensive line's play last weekend raised some question marks.

"[I've been] disappointed in the offensive line a little bit," Whipple said.

The defensive line didn't fair much better against Northeastern, but Whipple is more concerned about the defensive unit as a whole than on one position.

"If we don't cover the guys," Whipple said, "it doesn't matter what pressure we get on them."

To recap, the Minutemen need to have improved play and effort from everyone, big-time mistakes from N.C. State's pro-level players, and luck in order to have a chance to win.

Hopefully David is bringing a big enough stone to Raleigh.

It is a virtual lock that this weekend's attendance at N.C. State's Carter-Finley Stadium will break the record for the largest crowd to ever watch a UMass football game. The current record of 30,846 was reached at Boston College in 1977. The Wolfpack's stadium holds 51,000 people and the school boasts a season-ticket base of 31,000.

UMass Head Coach Mark Whipple has an 0-2 record against Division I-A teams while in Amherst, including last season's 49-20 loss at Marshall.

Cross country teams look for improvement at Meet of Champions

By Mike Marzelli
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

The University of Massachusetts' men's and women's cross country teams return to action this Saturday in the Brother Doyle Memorial Meet of Champions at Van Cortlandt Park in the Bronx, N.Y. Looking to improve on their second and third place finishes, respectively, in last weekend's lone home meet at Totman Field, both teams will be facing stiff competition from schools both large and small.

Saturday's field will include Division I power Dartmouth, ranked 16th nationally, and host Iona, ranked 21st. Also competing will be local rivals BU, Stonehill, Bentley, and UMass-Lowell. Men's head coach Ken O'Brien, however, does not feel that the daunting task of facing accomplished programs will hinder his team's strides toward improvement, especially following a meet in which 75 percent of the team improved their time by 10 seconds or more.

"The biggest thing that pleases me on a week-to-week basis is the fact that the kids really know what to do individually to improve themselves," O'Brien said. "They work harder each week, and as long as they continue to focus on what they need to do, then success as a team will follow."

In examining this year's men's team, which is comprised mostly of sophomores and juniors, it is hard to discount the fact that anxiety and a lack of experience will likely play a significant role in both preparation and performance.

However, "treating this meet like any other," senior Colin Baughman said, "is important for all of us. You need to enter a race like this with a completely different game plan. We must maintain a small meet attitude despite the much larger field, because we're not necessarily out to win the meet, but rather to run more efficiently as individuals and as a team. Improvement remains our number one goal."

On the women's side, Head Coach Julie Lafreniere's squad hopes to improve on their 3rd place finish with a successful team showing this weekend. Similar to their male counterparts, the woman's roster is filled will inexperience, however senior Julie McGee says that has not stopped her team from succeeding.

"We've been doing very well," McGee said. "Running together in paths has led to better success as a team, and we're hoping to at least maintain that style while improving our times and moving up."

Moving up, for the women's team, would translate into bettering the trio of sophomore Alexis Anzelone, McGee, and senior Elizabeth Mitchell's seventh, eighth, and ninth place finishes, respectively, in last week's home meet. In keeping with their strategy of running in paths, the three top finishers completed the course a mere five seconds apart. Coming off such an encouraging showing, the team has been working harder during the past week in hopes of further improvement.

"We've been pushing ourselves longer and harder in practice," McGee said. "The girls have been running greater distances and in longer intervals in hopes of strengthening ourselves for the longer course we'll be facing on Saturday."

A longer course, as McGee alluded to, is a challenge both teams will have to overcome if they hope to run well in the Meet of Champions. The women will be running 6000 meters, as compared to the 5000 they usually compete in, and the men will jump from 6000 to 8000.

"When young runners come out of high school they are used to running courses 2500 to 3000 meters, and the jump to 6000 is often tough to adjust to" O'Brien said. "It takes a lot of hard work and dedication to further develop yourself to compete at such longer distances."

The women's race this Saturday will begin at 10:30 a.m., with the men's to follow at 11:15 a.m.

UMass faces toughest test

ACC's Wolfpack is the hottest team in nation

By Jim Pignatiello
COLLEGIAN STAFF

This isn't a movie.

If it was, we could expect the small program to defeat the big program with relative ease, but this isn't Hoosiers–and in the real sports world the Davids rarely beat the Goliaths.

Saturday's game between the Massachusetts football team (2-1, 0-1 Atlantic 10) and North Carolina State (3-0, 1-0) is just a case of a Division I-AA team taking on (just another) Division I-A squad – the Wolfpack is rated No. 15 in the country.

National analyst Terry Bowden has called N.C. State quarterback Phillip Rivers the best quarterback in the nation, and UMass Head Coach Mark Whipple agrees.

"He's unbelievable," Whipple said. "He's just really, really bright. He's going to be a first rounder. He's a pro passer.

"He makes plays scrambling. He knows where everybody is."

Now that Pack freshman running back T.A. McLendon has established himself as the team's clear number one running back in last week's 51-48 win over Texas Tech with a 150-yard, five-touchdown performance, opposing defenses will be unable to simply key in on Rivers and the passing game.

And the receivers are top notch too.

Unlike every other game this season, Whipple can't expect to win this one. The Brown alum realizes that a wide array of things have to go his way just to have a shot at improving to 3-1.

"Rivers [has] to play his worst game," Whipple said. "McLendon [has] to lay the ball on the ground. [The whole team has] to lay the ball on the ground.

"[We must] play really, really well on offense and [they must] be very flat. I'm sure they can't be very excited about playing us."

What Whipple really wants to see is an improvement from last week's 42-17 loss to Northeastern. He wasn't pleased that the team didn't get any better from Week Two's win over AIC to Week Three's disappointment in Brookline, Mass.

But mostly, it's effort that Whipple really wants to see in Raleigh Saturday.

"In twelve quarters [this season], we've played really hard for two quarters," Whipple said. "The first quarter against Central Connecticut State and first quarter [against] AIC. And that's really disappointing."

Not that the fifth-year coach is putting all of the blame on the players' efforts.

"It's my job to get them to play hard," Whipple said. "[The Northeastern game] would have been a bad Mass practice."

"If you don't play hard, you don't have a chance to win"

One of the few positives Whipple and the Minutemen were able to take from the Northeastern loss was the play of transfer quarterback Jeff Krohn. No. 7 was pounded into the ground on pass play after pass play, but he kept getting up and kept his composure.

"[Now] our offense knows how tough the guy is," said Whipple, who had seen Krohn's sturdiness and competitive nature while he played for Arizona State.

"This guy can take us places."

Krohn did throw three interceptions in the contest, but his coach pointed out that one was due to a poorly run route by a receiver and another came when the QB was hit as he was releasing the ball. The former Sun Devil did break the school pass-

Why I-AA teams play against I-A

By Matt Brady
COLLEGIAN STAFF

It's not often that a I-AA program gets in the situation the Massachusetts football team is in this weekend.

When the Minutemen head south to face off against North Carolina State on Saturday, not only will they be taking on an opponent in the oft-powerful ACC that happens to be ranked No. 15 team in the nation, but they will also be facing a player under center who is widely being hailed as the best quarterback in the nation: Philip Rivers.

With the odds of pulling off a victory so remote, why would any school want to schedule such a game?

"There's three things we look for in scheduling these games," Athletic Director Ian McCaw explained. "First, we want to enhance our revenue; second, we get increased exposure, both in terms of the media and in terms of recruiting; and third, we are putting ourselves in a position to compete with the opponents."

The financial benefits are obviously a big plus for a school with as highly regarded an athletics program as UMass, especially considering the fact that the University does not have I-A football as a major revenue outlet, as most other top-flight programs do. The game against N.C. State is guaranteed to deliver $185,000 to UMass, with the possibility of pulling in more, according to McCaw.

"That's a reasonably attractive financial guarantee to play a Division I-A school," he said.

Success is also not completely uncommon when a I-AA team plays up. Twice this year Atlantic 10 teams have posted victories over I-A programs (Villanova over Rutgers, Northeastern over Ohio), though success is far rarer against a Top 25 team. While McCaw served as AD at Northeastern, the Huskies played three games against I-A opponents, winning two and dropping a third in a hard-fought game against Boston College in 2000.

BC was slated to face off against the Minutemen next year, but the agreement fell through, meaning the Maroon and White will likely have to replace the game with a Div. II game, much as it did when Kansas State cancelled in 2000.

"I've had conversations with the AD at BC, and we're talking about BC for a future date," McCaw said.

In addition to the financial benefits, playing a top-notch program can greatly benefit the skill level of a team at a lower level, as miniscule weaknesses can become greatly magnified against upper echelon football

Teacher beats student

By Todd Foster
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

As her team warmed up for the game, she looked down the sideline and saw the woman who taught her so much about the game that has been so important. Her mentor, the person that was always there for her and showed what it took to win at the collegiate level.

That's what Patty Shea saw as she looked down the sideline as Sue Caples and the Harvard field hockey team prepared to go head-to-head with Shea and the Massachusetts field hockey team (0-8).

In 1981, Caples was the captain of the Minutewomen squad that made its first ever NCAA Championship appearance. Shea, only a sophomore, was the starting goalie for '81 NCAA runners-up and credits Caples as her mentor back in her playing days. In sports though, you put the feelings aside and focus on the game ahead.

Under the lights of Garber Field, UMass dug itself a huge hole by falling 3-0 by the end of the first half. The second half was the exact opposite as the Maroon and White played the best half of hockey all year, but still couldn't find a way to pull off a score. The end result was 4-0 loss to Caples and the rest of Crimson.

"The second half was the best half of hockey we played all year," Shea said. "They started to feed the small passes and move as a unit. There were a lot good things happened in the second half.

"There were also a lot of good things in the first seven minutes, too."

The Minutewomen came out on fire in the early moments of the game. The momentum seemed to belong to UMass, which caught a break. The Maroon and White was given a penalty shot and a chance to take the lead early.

Saving a penalty shot in field hockey is almost impossible, but Crimson netminder Katie Zacarian, a Amherst native, made a spectacular diving save to keep the game scoreless. Zacarian's huge save gave the momentum to Harvard, instead giving the Minutewomen the early lead.

"We got a stroke right away, and here's a chance to go up, 1-0. The goalkeeper made a great save on the shot," said Shea, who had 54 career shutouts between '80-'83.

"And then, all of sudden, we couldn't take advan-

Usual suspects likely to take Champions

Over the last two weeks, the European soccer season has finally gotten into full swing with the onset of this season's Champions League Campaign.

The winner will have played seventeen games before they fine up for the final in Manchester, England in May 2003, including 12 group games just to reach the knock out stages.

All the usual suspects are present again with the winner likely to come from England, Italy, Germany or Spain. The favorites have to be the defending champions, Spanish giants Real Madrid, who have further strengthened their squad for this campaign capturing World Cup Golden Boot winner Ronaldo from Inter Milan. Also competing from Spain are domestic champions Valencia who were finalists in 2000 and 2001 and Barcelona who have lost Rivaldo over the summer but still possess a squad capable of going all the way. The four strong Spanish contingents are completed by Deportivo la Coruna which are arguably the weakest of the four but would consider it a failure if they didn't reach the last eight.

NICK WRIGHT

From England, Manchester United, who bought England's World Cup star defender Rio Ferdinand for close to $50 million this summer, and Arsenal can justifiably harbor realistic ambitions of winning the competition, whilst for Liverpool led by Michael Owen winning the competition will probably be a step too far this season and for first time competitors Newcastle it would be an achievement to make it out of a tough first round group.

From Italy, domestic champions Juventus will be hoping to recapture the glory days of the mid-90s when they won two Champions league titles. They have much the same squad as last year, but have signed Italian international striker Marco Di Viao. Also from Italy come Roma, they failed to reach the last eight last year will expect to reach the knockout stages this time round.

Making up the Italian foursome are the two Milan teams, Inter and AC. AC Milan has been busy but cost effective in the transfer market during the summer. They signed both Alessandro Nesta from rivals Lazio and Rivaldo from Barcelona on free transfers.

Inter Milan, meanwhile, has replaced the departed Ronaldo with another South American, Argentinean Herman Crespo, who joined from Lazio. They have also shored up their defense by signing Fabio Cannavaro from Parma.

As usual, Bayern Munich will lead the German charge. They may have lost inspirational captain Stefan Effenberg but they have more than compensated for this by signing German golden boys, Michael Ballack from last year's beaten finalists Bayer Leverkusen and Sebastian Deisler from Hertha Berlin. Bayern also signed Brazilian winger Ze Reberto from Bayer Leverkusen.

Leverkusen, last year's beaten finalists, are not expected to repeat last year's performance. Although they have some impressive players such as Brazilian World Cup-winning center-back Lucio & Turkish playmaker, Yildiray Basturk, they've lost their best player in Michael Ballack. And despite signing Brazilian striker Franca to add much-needed firepower up front, expect them to struggle to reach the last eight this time round.

The third and final German team in this year's competition is Dortmund. They will expect to make it to group stage two but anything further than that will most likely be seen as an achievement, although good performances from star players such as Thomas Rosicky and Brazilian striker Amoroso could see them exceed expectations.

The only side not from Italy, Germany, Spain and England who may perhaps upset the form book are Turkish side Galatasaray, visiting teams find it notoriously difficult to play in their stadium and if they can improve their form on the road they could spring a surprise and reach the last eight.

Only two weeks' matches have been played in this year's competition, but already Madrid is the team to beat, having beaten Roma 3-0 in Italy and then destroying Belgium side Genk 6-0 at home yesterday evening. There have also been some shocking results with last season's defeated finalists, Leverkusen losing 5-2 to Olympiakos on match day one and Munich losing at home 3-2 against Spanish side Deportivo. Only six sides, Madrid, Arsenal, Manchester United, Milan, Valencia and Barcelona carry 100 percent records into match day three which takes place Oct. 1st and 2nd.

Governor hopeful expresses concerns

Green Party candidate focuses on inequalities between political groups

By Courtney Charles
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Jill Stein, the Green Party gubernatorial candidate, asked a crowd of 65 yesterday at Memorial Hall, "Aren't the public airways supposed to be public?" Her speech focused on inequalities in public policy and biased campaign tactics.

"The truth speaks loud. All you need is to have a level playing field," Stein said, referring to her exclusion from the televised gubernatorial debates. Stein alleges she is running a clean election campaign and as of yet has seen little media coverage.

The access to public airways limits the debates and talk time to the two major party candidates. During the Sept. 24 debate at Western New England College in Springfield, Stein and supporters protested their exclusion from outside the school.

"It makes it easier for the media to have only two candidates," Stein said. Typically a candidate needs 15 percent of voter support in the polls to be able to participate in a debate. The most recent poll in the Boston Herald had her at less than one percent.

According to Stein the two major candidates are recipients of funding from big business that buys time from the media and advertising.

Stein said that 80 percent of funding contributions come from less than one percent of the people in the state. "Romney's list of contributors reads like a who's who in financial services," she said.

In response to a question asking if voting for the Green Party is like throwing away a vote, Stein said "To vote within the current system is to throw away a vote."

"Many people fail to see the difference between Tom Finneran and Mitt Romney. I'm not sure there is one," she said.

Stein addressed several other key issues including inequalities in health care access, wealth distribution, and environmental and health risks. "We can't take health out of the context of policy, and we can't take policy out of the concept of politics. We live in a political world," Stein said.

Single payer insurance, a plan where one insurance carrier covers the entire state, is one of Stein's ideals. Single payer insurance is cost-effective and cuts the mess of paperwork by half, according to Stein. She attributed its failure to a disinformation campaign by insurance agencies.

Limited health care access for minorities and low-income communities is one of Stein's issues of inequality. These groups are also more likely to be at risk for environmental health hazards because these areas are more likely to be sites of hazardous products like auto body shops and incinerators, said Stein.

Even in the current Medicare system, low-income people and minorities are less likely to get eye exams for diabetics, follow-ups for mental health, and chances of getting proper medications, according to Stein.

She also addressed economic inequalities. "There is no greater risk factor for poverty than coming from poverty," Stein said.

Stein said that the top one percent of people in the state economically has the same amount of wealth that the lower 90 percent has combined. Even during the so-called economic boom of the 90s, only one out of five in the state noticed an increase in income. The bottom 20 percent lost income, said Stein.

"We've squandered a decade of prosperity on tax breaks for the wealthy," Stein said.

Much of the audience had a positive reaction to the lecture.

"The speech changed my ideas about how some parties have a hard time coming across to voters," said Molly O'Brien, 22, a senior journalism major.

"I didn't think there was enough publicity for the speaking event. It was really interesting to hear a candidate who addresses real issues, issues that are important to me," said Francis Shiman-Hackett, 22, a senior journalism and philosophy major.

A graduate of Harvard College and Harvard Medical School, Stein has been an instructor of medicine at Harvard Medical School for the past 20 years. She also is a staff physician at Simmons College Health Center. She is a national public health advocate, an environmental health consultant, and a wife and mother. She is especially concerned with the increasing rates of asthma, cancer, and learning disabilities in the population.

Green Party gubernatorial candidate Jill Stein stresses an issue at Memorial Hall yesterday. Stein said that it is easier for the media to have just two candidates in an election race.

SGA elections pending; results out next week

Returns on the Student Government Association (SGA) election ballots are in, but have not been counted yet.

Originally, the SGA hoped to have voting stations open on two days instead of the usual one. Secretary of Administrative Affairs Jason Bissonnette said that there were not enough elections commissioners available for Thursday because of class conflicts.

Forty-six of the 78 Senate seats are up for election. There are also three referendum questions on this year's ballot. One of the questions was about placing security cameras in campus residence halls, as there already are in the lobbies of John Quincy Adams, Patterson and Van Meter dormitories.

Another question asked students to vote on the sale of alcohol during events in the Mullins Center.

In light of the recent budget cuts, the last referendum question asked students if the SGA should spend more money advocating UMass on the state level.

The SGA needs five percent of the student body to vote in order to ratify the elections. According to Bissonnette, the first returns look good. "The total returns so far are believed to be over five percent," said Bissonnette. "But the final numbers have not been tabulated yet."

Last September's senate election saw a seven percent turnout. Bissonnette expects the numbers to be comparable this year. "I think it's a pretty normal year," said Bissonnette.

The results for the area government elections have already been counted. Bissonnette expects to release all of the results and have all of the area governments fully in place by Monday. Bissonnette said results should be out sometime next week and that the senate will convene on Oct. 2.

"We're hoping to have the first SGA meeting Wednesday and committees in place by the week after," said Bissonnette.

The Collegian will have a full report on election results and the first Senate meeting next week.

SGA ballots are in, but not counted yet. The results of this year's elections and ballot questions will be released sometime early next week.

Columbia prof addresses UMass

Lecture stresses 9-11 changes

By Erica H. Mattison
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Renowned historian and Columbia Professor Eric Foner told a crowd of about 65 at Memorial Hall last night, "Sept. 11 [2001] was not as transformative an event as World War II, but it will change how we teach American history."

Foner outlined "four surprises" that appeared during the last year: the upsurge of patriotism, the use of freedom as justification for the War on Terror, the surrender of civil liberties, and a new awareness of the distrust of America abroad.

Foner argued, "this new language of freedom leads me to think that we need to[educate students about the way the word has been used in the past, disagreeing with President Bush's comment that 'ours is a history of freedom, freedom for everybody.'"

Throughout his talk, Foner referred to former Secretary of Education William Bennett, who has criticized Foner for his opinions. Last March, Bennett announced the formation of Americans for Victory Over Terrorism (AVOT).

On the AVOT website, the organization's mission is described as "promoting the democratic ideals of freedom, liberty, equality, and human rights – the very virtues terrorist groups and terrorist states wish to eradicate – and answer those who seek to erode our nation's resolve and commitment to light and defeat the evil of terrorism."

Foner takes a stand that is in contrast to Bennett and AVOT. Last night, Foner said that it is too simple to label people as supporters of freedom or enemies of freedom. He responded to questions of past criticisms of him, saying, "I'm happy because it means I'm getting under their skin by saying things they don't agree with."

At the same time, he dismissed the naysayers. "I honestly don't care what those people say about me."

Foner said, "American policy has more to do with terrorism than a general dislike for freedom...If it's freedom they're so mad about, why don't you see them attacking Denmark or Canada? It's not American freedom, but American power [that elicits skepticism among people abroad]."

He distinguished the recent terrorism that America has experienced from terrorist acts in other countries. "[Sept. 11, 2001] was such a shock to our sense of invulnerability. In America we've always felt invulnerable in the way no other nation has."

As for education, Foner maintained that the study of American history must include "the strengths and weaknesses" of the country, rather than turn to a dismissive, "self-congratulatory" tone. "We need to develop an honest, candid portrayal of our history. Sept. 11 [2001] has made this more possible. We must provide a good historic explanation for why this happened, not try to predict the future."

He said that when we study the United States, "we should study our relationship with other countries. Our heightened awareness of globalization should challenge historians to think about how our history is bigger than [our own country]."

Dear ALANA Community members and Allies,

"ALANA ia an acronym for African, Latino(a), Asian, and Native American"

Our organizations have decided to sponsor a community meeting in light of the plight of issues that have troubled our campus regarding services to the ALANA and Low Income students at the University during the last 15 years. (Ex. The Elimination of Upward Bound, The 1992 ALANA Agreement, The Goodell Incident, The Academic Support Programs Current problems, The Termination/Firing of Ric M Townes, etc.)

We would like to invite you to join us an ALANA ALUMNI TEACH IN that we are hosting to EDUCATE the campus community regarding; "The history of people of color at the UMass and their current struggles". The TEACH IN will be this coming Saturday, September 28 at 6pm in the Campus Center Auditorium.

UMass Alumni
State Rep. Benjamin Swan
12th Hampen District will be a key note speaker.

ALANA to hold teach-in stressing diversity issues

By Dan Lamothe
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Office of African, Latino, Asian and Native American (ALANA) Affairs will host a teach-in Saturday night in the first in a series of events designed to draw attention to trouble minority students have had on campus.

Keynote speakers state representative Benjamin Swan and Judge Luis Perez will lead the 6 p.m. teach-in, which takes place in the Campus Center Auditorium. Current University of Massachusetts students and alumni will address problems that are currently affecting minorities on campus, such as the cuts in the academic support programs and the elimination of the position of Assistant Vice Chancellor for Campus Activities, a spot held by Ricardo M. Townes.

The theme of the teach-in is "The history of people of color at UMass and their current struggles."

"We're going to connect the history of what people have done in the past in facing problems like these to things going on right now," said Sonny Suchdev, a graduate assistant and coordinator of community development and programs.

According to Suchdev, the event is being held on a Saturday night so that alumni can come. "We're hoping that a lot of undergrads will be concerned and committed enough to come," he said. "We're hoping to get 500 or 400 students out there."

Swan will address responsibilities UMass has to take to "safeguard the access, retention and services to students from low-income communities." Perez will speak on the issue of access and support services.

Suchdev believes that this is just the beginning. "I think there will be a lot of events this semester like this," he said.

Suchdev isn't quite sure what shape those events will take, though. He mentioned rallies, protests, and academic forums as possibilities. "Future events are really going to depend on what action students want to take," he said. "In reality this is all student driven, whether it be protests or letters or whatever."

The teach-in is only one part of events the Office of ALANA Affairs has planned for the weekend. While alumni are here for the teach-in, many of them will have the opportunity to meet Chancellor John Lombardi for the first time in the afternoon on Saturday. "The purpose is for them to be able to feel him out and initiate some dialog with him," Suchdev said.

The program will provide dinner for all of those in attendance.

Golden Key chapter wins award

The University of Massachusetts chapter of the Golden Key International Honor Society won the prestigious Key Chapter Award in Atlanta's August 2002 Golden Key International Convention.

The selection of Key Chapter Award winners marks a 20-year tradition for the Society. The criteria that the society looks for in chapters excelling come in five major areas: communication, publicity, meeting management, chapter activities and leadership, as well as in participation in regional and international programs. In Atlanta, representatives from UMass accepted the award in front of 1,200 delegates from around the world.

Led by chapter advisor and Associate Dean of Students Gladys Rodriguez, the UMass chapter hosted the 2001 Northeast Regional Conference and won an Honorable Mention Key Chapter Award at the 2001 Golden Key International Convention. Winning this award inspired the chapter to continue its effort to make a difference.

This year, the chapter continued with its annual Books and Bears collection at the induction, with proceeds benefiting a local pediatric clinic. Other service projects that the chapter has been involved in include a 20-mile walk for hunger, service at soup kitchens and knitting blankets for the Red Cross.

The Golden Key International Honor Society was founded in 1977 in Atlanta, Ga. The global non-profit organization not only provides academic recognition to college juniors and seniors in the top 15 percent of their class, but also offers leadership opportunities, community service, career networking and scholarships. Worldwide, the society has 320 chapters in the United States, Australia, Canada, Great Britain, Malaysia, South Africa and New Zealand.

Membership to the Society is by invitation only, and is open to students in all fields. The UMass Golden Key Honor Society's purpose is to recognize and encourage scholastic achievement and excellence in all undergraduate fields of study, providing recognition to students who are superior academically without requiring individual participation.

The lecture was well received by most. "I think it was very relevant," said Continuing Education teacher and UMass history Ph.D. student Robert Surbrug. "I came wanting to hear his take on teaching history after Sept. 11 [2001]."

Surbrug and others noted that it has been a challenge to teach history during the past year because some students express strong patriotism, while others are afraid to express how they feel for fear of sounding politically incorrect.

Alice Nash, a UMass professor of Native American history, applauded Foner for "calling on people to have a more historic understanding of current events. We need thoughtful discussion on this."

The lecture was a part of the University of Massachusetts/Five College Graduate Program in History. The series celebrates the Five College Graduate Program, a partnership among historians at Amherst, Hampshire, Mount Holyoke, Smith and UMass.

In previous years, the series has hosted Bonnie Smith, Daniel Rodgers, John Dower, and Natalie Zemon Davis. "Last year the lecture was scheduled for Sept. 12 but of course that got changed. It was held in October instead," explained David Glassberg, chair of the UMass Department of History.

"There is usually a Five College connection, but this year that isn't the case," Glassburg said. "We chose someone [Foner] who we knew and thought would give a great talk."

Foner does have ties to the area. "Several of my former students are in the area," he said. "For example, Professor Manisha Sinha in Afro-American Studies." Foner has also done research at Smith College.

Last night was Foner's first time speaking at UMass.

Eric Foner speaks to a crowd at Memorial Hall yesterday. Foner is a renowned professor of history at the University of Columbia.

Too smart for strangers

Prevent child abductions

Protests over union contracts. Riots at the Townhouses. Sexual assaults. The head of a decapitated goat being found in a sink. With all that goes on here on campus, it is easy to forget about the rest of the world. Those of us at college seem to have enough of our own problems. Lately though, a disturbing trend has been growing in the commonwealth that threatens those who are our most innocent.

Three times in the past week there have been attempted child abductions in Massachusetts. On Thursday, Sept. 20, a Southborough boy and girl were approached by a man in his car, in separate incidents, while they were waiting for the school bus. The girl was with her grandmother, who declined the man's offer to drive her granddaughter to school. Approximately fifteen minutes later, the boy was approached by a man in his car asking for directions. The boy gave him the information and was then asked by the man to come in the car to show him exactly where to go. When the boy declined, he ran on foot until he found safe haven.

Police have determined through descriptions, that both attempts were by the same man.

This past Wednesday, a four-year-old girl and her two-year-old nephew were playing on the front steps of her Auburn home. A man pulled up in front of the house and asked her to come into the car to pet his dog. When she screamed no, her 21-year-old sister came outside as the car sped away.

Both these instances bring to light some serious reminders to parents and caretakers everywhere. The world is a scary place, and not just in far off countries or the big cities. Bad things happen in small towns all the time, often because these are the most unsuspecting places.

There are some simple things that parents can do to try to prevent tragedies. The most important thing is to talk with your children about strangers and make sure that they know how to respond. The children previously mentioned obviously had been trained well. If approached by a stranger, the best advice is to run away as quickly as possible, and also alert the attention of others. Make sure your children know to never get in a stranger's car or to stay in a public place.

Aside from teaching children, there are other ways parents can make things safer. With children as young as four, there is no reason that they should be playing a front yard alone. Likewise, with a fourth grader as the boy in Southborough was, it is tricky ground. Obviously children want to grow up, but parents must also understand that children still need supervision. With a group of friends, the child is likely to be in less danger than if s/he was waiting at the bus stop alone.

Massachusetts' AMBER Alert System, or America's Missing: Broadcast Emergency Response, goes into effect on Tuesday. The system, already in place in 41 states, will utilize highway signs as well as radio and television broadcasts to alert the public about recently abducted children. Such a system will be a great aid to police, but we must always remember that the best protection plan is to teach our children how to avoid abductions in the first place.

I wish I were writing this on a typewriter. Manual, with an ink loaded ribbon.

Whatever it is about the primal nature of writing has included an innate and undying desire for me to have a typewriter, fully loaded, with nothing.

Yes nothing, that is all I want. A little extra effort to hit the keys, a little extra thought going into my work. Knowing that to hit backspace is no longer an option.

You see all the old movies, the old photos, when the reporters are hunched over their Underwood typewriters in a dimly lit, smoke-filled room. The true punchers, the journalists who would peck away all night long to meet the deadline, that is cool.

Kerouac typed the length of On The Road on one continuous spool of paper with his Underwood. That is the essence of writing. In the documentary Don't Look Back, Bob Dylan is seen writing out lyrics as Joan Baez sings "Percy's Song" in the background.

> "I want a manual typewriter, perhaps one that has been used by Bob Dylan."

Black and white film, dim, smoke-filled room, acoustic guitar, folk legends and a manual typewriter.

I can imagine Vietnam and World War II war correspondents and LIFE photographer Robert Capa punching out his memoirs on a manual typewriter while looking at the photos from his Leica and Contax cameras.

And that's another thing, a love of manual cameras. In this world of digital controls, it is satisfying to take a photograph with a manual camera. The Pentax K1000, the tank of a camera used by many of the photographers in Vietnam. The Yashica medium format twin-lens that takes high quality shots for one tenth the price of a Hasselblad.

The cameras, I already have, the typewriter, I need to get.

This is not the diatribe of a control freak, though I can assure you that there are several who would disagree on that point. There is a relief with that control though, knowing that your work is truly yours.

Every key stroke that goes down, or even a shutter clicking, is the product of creativity, or a lack thereof. There is a deliberate sense to the use of a typewriter and the setting of shutters and f/stops.

Some would argue that it speaks to the subconscious; whatever ends up on paper or film is meant to be out in the open. Regardless, there are no Microsoft programmed corrections that will add apostrophes, make words skip to the next line or underline your sentence fragments.

Watch the movie Wonder Boys. The story of Professor Grady Tripp, played by Michael Douglas, who writes several thousands of pages of text for his next publication on a typewriter in the upstairs room. Toward the end of the movie Tripp's manuscript blows out of an open car door and is sent out to the world, unrefined and unperfected.

When asked what his since lost story was about, Tripp cannot describe it. But there is no floppy disk for him to pop in and print it out again. What was on paper is all that there was.

Perhaps the saddest part of the movie is when you see Douglas sitting at a laptop finishing his novel. The computer is becoming a necessary thing for published work, but a candle of old realism was put out when Tripp left his typewriter.

I want a manual typewriter, perhaps one that has been used by Bob Dylan.

Supporting the dependents

Dependency.

We are a nation of dependents. Not that we are somehow evil, or unique in this, but the American Public is dependent. And, on a personal level, we are incredibly dependent on each other.

I have a small group of friends that I am dependent on to be there for me when the chain of events in my day leaves me a mere shell of myself. I depend on my family to house me when I find myself at the other version of home in eastern Massachusetts. I am dependent on the cable system here at the University to provide me with quality entertainment, so that I don't find myself in the unfortunate position of cracking textbooks open at 8 p.m. I also am dependent on my dining common to have at least one menu selection that I can look at without dry heaving.

Most of these dependencies are always filled. My friends are the best, and no, I'm not biased. I'm a journalist after all. My family is always happy to see me, or at least they act the part well enough to bring me back every once in a while. The cable and food situation, well, "hit or miss" is a popular phrase for a reason.

We all have dependencies like this. We all find ourselves in situations where, should one or two things go wrong, our entire day, week, month, possibly even life takes an uncomfortable turn. It's part of our nature to depend on people, and to depend on things we have been taught will be a part of our lives every day.

Of course, one day last fall changed that thinking for many of us, but I'm not here to reflect or commemorate 9/11-plus-381. My point is merely that we learn every day, in one way or another, that we should depend on something to be the exact same way it was the day before. And there are days, minutes in our lives when we learn in sometimes violent fashion that all we have depended on will not in fact be there tomorrow.

What I have learned in my short time on this spinning pebble we call home, is that we are not doing anything wrong by being dependent on each other and the simple things around us. However, we also must remember the ability to bounce back when things go wrong. Dwelling on the little faults in our game plan (sorry, I'm a sports guy) denies us the chance to live in the improbable, to survive and improve when the events of our lives require doing a little improvising.

There are hundreds of little functions in my day, as I'm sure there are in anyone else's, which can, and usually do go wrong. The C-Store might not have the newest copy of The Hockey News, I might run into someone I don't particularly want to talk to, the person who sits next to me in one of our many giant lecture halls might have a sniffling problem, or want to read the article just above mine in the newspaper, and will express that desire through unwanted intimacy.

I'll admit, there are days when things like this are enough to make me want to run far away and join the carnies at the Big E, maybe start coercing small children into trying to bounce a wiffle ball off a backboard into a laundry basket, when I know that the only way to complete such a maneuver is to stand as close to the board as I do, which, of course, is against the rules.

Nevertheless, it's also important to remember that there's a flip side of the fun little games that fate likes to play on us. For instance, while I hadn't really expected to be in the office tonight, but rather sitting at home watching the season premiere of "Friends," I still had a fun little surprise when two of the best people in the world walked in to hang out for a few minutes. Also, some of my dependency paid off, when I was able to find my roommate and make him tape the NBC sitcoms for me, for which I'm quite grateful.

My real point, however, is that these dependencies become infectious, and we begin to take things for granted so much that a slight change in plan becomes catastrophic. The ability to stay on one's feet is missing for a lot of us, and it's important that in these trying, hectic years at college, we remember what our goals are, and that adapting to the little situations that are placed in front of us becomes a stronger skill, so that the next time the rain falls unexpectedly, we're not all stuck out in the weather, feeling miserable because the day couldn't get any worse, and instead find the little joys that are folded into every trauma.

It wasn't broken; you shouldn't have taken a hammer to it

EDUARDO BUSTAMANTE

Listen: If you happen to be reading this article and you appreciate diversity, are not shortsighted, a racist, or a bigot, do yourself a favor – cut out this page and drop it off on Chancellor John V. Lombardi's desk at 374 Whitmore. Imagine the chancellor returning to campus Monday morning to find a couple thousand copies of this article in his mailbox. Think it would send a message?

There is a race gap in educational achievement. Studies have shown that students of color are far less likely to graduate college then their white counterparts. There are two possible explanations for this. The first is that people of color lack the type of intelligence required to excel as students. If you believe in a link between race and intelligence you are the definition of a racist. The second explanation is that there are extenuating circumstances, which negatively affect the performance of minority students. In other words, it is not a level playing field. If you are not a racist, you agree with this second explanation.

Fortunately, UMass agreed with the second explanation as well. Going as far as to write in the Admissions Task Force Report of 1969 that one of its goals was, "paying special attention to meeting the needs of students from varied social, cultural and ethnic backgrounds." Furthermore, it wrote of the benefits of a diverse community, "promoting the multicultural awareness and support and appreciation of, and respect for, diversity essential to a pluralistic, transnational society."

Surprisingly, the University did an amazing job of this. Since the 1960s, UMass has been home to a group of programs that came to be national leaders in recruitment and retention of minority students. Today, the Committee for the Collegiate Education of Black and other Minority Students (CCEMBMS), Bilingual Collegiate Program (BCP), Native American Student Support Services Program (NASSS), and the United Asia Learning Resource Center (UALRC) all work together with the Office of African, Latino/a, Asian/Pacific Islander and Native American (ALANA) Affairs to promote the University's vision. A study by the Office of Institutional Research conducted in fall 2000 showed that the retention rate for ALANA students was 81.4 percent vs. 84.4 percent for White students.

Just to give you a slight idea of how successful these programs have been, recently National Public Radio had a special on Dr. Don Brown, director of the AHANA program at Boston College. Dr. Brown gets paid to speak and serve as a consultant to other universities about his program, which is based on the CCEMBS model. Yes, UMass has the original model for what other universities are paying to be taught.

And so, UMass sets the precedent for the rest of the nation regarding diversity with its superior recruitment and retention of minority students. This campus serves as a home for roughly 2000 ALANA students, 74.4 percent of whom reported in the Diverse Democracy Survey of 2000 that they chose UMass because of the minority support programs. If you add that all up, that's 1,488 minority students who are on this campus specifically for these programs.

Sound too good to be true? It is. Over the summer some of the people that had been cornerstones of these programs for decades retired. At the same time, UMass entered its financial crisis. In February 2002, Joseph Marshall, Assistant Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs and Dean of Enrollment services, requested that a committee of ALANA program leaders come up with a plan for the restructuring of the minority programs to "withstand future resource reductions."

The ALANA program's committee, headed by Sidonio Ferreira and Janette Mendez, submitted its recommendations on April 1, 2002. Essentially, it said that any further budget cuts would hurt and made four recommendations. The fourth was that the support programs could not afford to lose their "critical services," – "academic advising and advocacy, and counseling." However, if worse came to worse, they believed that the programs could still run efficiently if they merged their "secondary services" – "referrals, tutorials and peer mentoring."

With this report in her hands ex-interim Chancellor Marcellette G. Williams did the exact opposite of what the committee recommended. She stripped the ALANA programs of their ability to academically advise minority students, transferring that responsibility to the Undergraduate Advising and Academic Support Center in the provost's office. Williams never explained her reasoning to the ALANA community. In fact, the only comment I could find was from ex-Vice Chancellor Javier Cevallos, who told newspapers that the changes were made due to "fiscal realities and to improve services to students." He added that, "It makes sense to put similar functions together in one area."

Williams and Cevallos didn't pioneer the nation's leading minority programs, and ignored the perfectly adequate financial option of cutting secondary services as recommended by those who had. And what's more, who exactly did Cevallos think this transfer would be more efficient for? Students of color from various backgrounds and class situations have different needs from white students. Latino and international students often need bilingual advisors. African-American students need advisors that are conscious of the social struggles of this society and can help them avoid the cracks of the UMass bureaucracy. ALANA students tend to avoid getting advice from the undergraduate advisors because of the bureaucratic, non-personal attention they get there. They are treated like another number instead of a person. Obviously if they feel this way, ALANA students won't even bother going to the advisors, which is sure to cause a decline in the retention of ALANA students.

As for Cevallos' statement that "It makes sense to put similar functions together in one area," he is making the mistake of assuming that all students have the same issues. If the advising that was going on in the ALANA programs was the same as that of the undergraduate office, that would be fine.

> "Students of color from various backgrounds and class situations have different needs from white students."

However, not only do minorities have separate needs from their white counterparts, they have separate needs from one another.

The leaders of the ALANA programs are pleading, facing the possible demise of their programs with decreased student participation. The academic advising programs were the teeth of these programs. Academic advising was what got the students in the office and from there, other activities provided an alternative from the regular, alienating University life. This is why it was listed in the ALANA committee report as the number one critical service.

It all boils down to this: while other schools are struggling to recruit and keep minority students, and paying Dr. Brown to advise them to transfer academic advising to minority support programs, UMass, pioneer and leader in the recruitment and retention of minority students, reverts to the method that the struggling schools use. What was Williams thinking when she undermined the effectiveness of the minority support programs and the University mission?

It doesn't matter; she's not here anymore. As it stands, not a single person involved with these programs agrees with her decision, save perhaps Joseph Marshall who I couldn't get in touch with. The acting chancellor has yet to take a stance on this issue. Ultimately, Lombardi must see that if he restores that which distinguished this University, every literate, non-racist, non-bigoted, thoughtful person on this campus will be singing his praises off the rooftops. There is no reason academic advising powers shouldn't be restored to ALANA programs.

As I see it, there are only four reasons you shouldn't drop this editorial off at on the chancellor's desk and ask him to bring back the academic advising programs. One – you think diversity is a bad thing. Two – you believe that it's pointless to restore these programs because the academic race gap is due to genetics (you are a racist). Three – you concede that there is not a level playing field, but refuse to attempt to level it because you see minorities' disadvantage as your advantage (you are a bigot). Or four – you are not yourself a minority and are thinking, "It's not my problem." You are being shortsighted, because one day the University might come for your basketball league or your newspaper.

John and Howie: Bringing musicianship back to music

HOWIE DAY

JOHN MAYER
Room for Squares
Aware/Columbia

Musical trends come and go, and with the limited number of actual trends, they inevitably return. (Well, usually. In 20 years the return of rap-rock could get shunted aside for, I don't know, polka-rap-techno hybrids.) Now the time has come again for sensitive male troubadours, handsome young men earnestly strumming acoustic guitars on coffeehouse stages, while girls melt in the audience. Leading the pack is unlikely pin-up John Mayer, a 24-year-old whose major label debut Room for Squares has slowly crept up to platinum status thanks to the hit single "No Such Thing."

Following Mayer's lead is Bangor, Maine newcomer Howie Day whose live performances have gained him an ever-growing cult following that threatens to explode if and when his debut, Australia, takes off on the sales charts.

Mayer and Day actually have a few qualities in common. Both have been compared to the Dave Matthews Band – Mayer for his smoky voice and his jazzy, easy-going, mellow sounds; Day, for his eclectic live performances in which he is armed with a guitar and a pedal loop that allows him to be his own back-up band. Both released their CDs back a while ago – Day in 2000, Mayer in early 2001 – to little notice. Both share a parent record company – Columbia, home to Epic and Aware Records – and both are getting their rightful corporate push now that acoustic guitars are now officially cool again. The difference is in their sounds and style.

Twenty-one-year-old Day recorded Australia over the course of 1999 with producer Mike Deneen, recording only two or three songs at a time and then touring to raise money for the rest. Ten of those songs were carved and shaped to form Australia, which won Day a 2001 Boston Music Award for Best Debut Album (he won one again this year, for Best Male Singer/Songwriter).

The songs have a darker, moodier tone than Mayer's more upbeat tunes. Take the album starter, "Sorry So Sorry." Day's serrated vocals play over midnight-colored funk. On Australia, Day plays with an actual back-up band, a departure from his live shows. But on tracks like "She Says" he returns to stripped-down, guy-with-a-guitar intimacy. The song consists of nothing but Day's searching, imploring voice cascading over a passionately strummed guitar. The result is nothing less than magic.

The most upbeat Day gets is on "Secret," a burbling pop song of soaring beauty. "Slow Down" surrounds Day's voice with harder rock-oriented backdrops. The first single, the atmospheric "Ghost" is adequate, but "Sorry So Sorry" or "She Says" would have made better choices for the leading single. After this, the rest of Australia begins to drift. It's not much – it's still a stronger album than say, the latest Britney Spears effort – but it loses some of the energy of the first half. Still, Howie Day is going to go far.

Mayer's music tends in a less Jeff Buckley direction than Howie Day. Room for Squares is more buoyant, cheerier than the gritty Australia. The songs are typical of "No Such Thing," the jaunty hit that made Mayer a name. Like that song, the album is mellow and unassuming, an uneager-to-bash-you-over-the-head recording that slowly creeps into your consciousness rather than grab your jugular off the bat (when I first heard "No Such Thing" I hardly gave it any thought, now I listen to it repeatedly.) The CD isn't just relaxing, it's relaxed, a calm and confident collection of breezy folk-pop tunes.

Mayer has also probably gained the attention he has because his lyrics are reflective of the lives of the young college-age folks who listen to him. "No Such Thing" is about a guy making something of himself when he exits the hell of high school. The sultry "Your Body Is A Wonderland" (rumored to be about Mayer's ex, Jennifer Love Hewitt, though that is probably unlikely) is an ode to a young love. "My Stupid Mouth" pairs bubbly light rock with lyrics about a guy who says the wrong thing. In "83" the singer wishes he was a kid living a simple life again. Mayer's words (either written by himself, or with Clay Cook) make an honest connection to the lives of his audience. They aren't forced, and they are easy to relate to.

Musically, Mayer is a focused musician. He's reportedly inspired by the likes of Stevie Ray Vaughn, which is noticeable on tracks like the slow groove of "Neon" or the jazz-funk of "City Love." Mayer steers away from bluesy sounds on "Love Song For No One," reveling in sunny summertime pop. And Mayer isn't without a sense of humor – there's no track 13 on the 14-track CD.

Howie Day and John Mayer are two different brands of the same thing: Young, musically-minded folk with a serious interest in making good music using only what is at there disposal – good vocals, strong lyricism, emotional realism and expert instrumentation. Long live the new singer/songwriters.

On the Verge

of greatness

ON THE VERGE
Ariella Papa
Red Dress Ink

Beach books are such wonderful reads. Books that don't require too much effort to understand but are legitimate entertainment. As someone who lacks a television, I read many books – although they are never school related. On the Verge is an example of great crawling-into-bed, read-50-pages-a-night novel that keeps you entertained and gives you relief from G-o-d-a-w-f-u-l school-related readings like microeconomics.

"On the Verge is such a great woman's book, especially for women college age and just out of school."

In the beginning, we meet Eve Vitali, a 23-year-old aspiring writer who works as an administrative assistant for a New York magazine. She's a recent college graduate who seemingly has her foot in the door with this position, but after working there for an extended period of time, she begins to become disgruntled and sick of watching brown-nosing pipsqueaks move ahead of her in the ranks at the company.

Eve is an interesting character that I think most college women can relate to. She's on the verge of something – whether it be a huge promotion or a nervous breakdown – one must pick up the book to find out. She's sarcastic and funny, but only the reader and a few close friends get to see that. At work, she upholds a perfect aura of professionalism and does whatever brainless, busy work task that her boss asks her to do. Eve has perfected the art of artificial cheriness and being a "yes" assistant, all the while going about her daily life with funny cynicism and biting wit.

Eve's life is that of the typical New Yorker. She fights the apartment hunting battle with close friend and roommate Roseanne. She bar hops with friends Roseanne and Tabitha (who's perhaps the most interesting character in the story and definitely not the 80s diet drink, Tab). I think everyone knows a Tabitha. She is that girl who wears Gucci and Calvin Klein all the time, gets all the men and has this seemingly endless vat of money. Tabitha and Eve work together at their magazine, although in different areas, so it's interesting that Tabitha would have so much money, because Eve is very unfamiliar with where Tabitha comes from.

One of the funniest and most shocking moments of the nearly 300 pages would be the moment where the reader finds out where Tabitha makes all the money she has to support her shopping habits. Tabitha's sense of humor and interesting perspectives on society and humanity are hysterical enough and just make the book worth checking out. Eve's family is also strong and supportive, although sometimes a bit overbearing. A major obstacle arises within Eve's family towards the middle of the story, which tests not only the strength of the family, but also Eve's personal sanity.

This is Ariella Papa's first novel, and she's set herself a high point to jump off of. On the Verge is such a great woman's book, especially for women college age and just out of school. I think everyone has worked a thankless, "yes, sir" job at some point, and this sheds some humor on that, holding the potential to inspire some women to do just as Eve did. On the Verge is entertaining and funny, but at the same time real. It's a great read for women everywhere.

Percy Hill rocks Pearl Street

PERCY HILL
Sept. 19

NORTHAMPTON – Percy Hill is a band with a tremendous amount of talent. Being a four-piece group can be slightly restrictive though, and yields them only a few avenues for jamming in their live shows. Nevertheless, since they are so incredibly energetic and talented, they make it work. For this brief fall tour, Percy has beefed up its ranks significantly by adding lead guitarist Adam Terrell, three percussionists, two backup singers, and a four-piece brass and woodwind section. The result is a much fuller, funkier sound that provides a far more versatile live act. This, matched with Percy Hill's trademark energy, allowed for a terrific performance last Friday.

The band laid out their newer, fuller sound by opening with the sweet, bouncy harmonies of "313." They then continued at that high-paced, funky level with straight-up versions of "Sharing on Creation" and "Slave." However, they did not truly show what they could now do until they cued up an epic version of "Color in Bloom." Built on a series of different climaxes, whether it was the furious, wailing, crescendo of the guitars, or the raging sax solo, the tune always seemed to return to the same relaxing jazz riff that would soon lead to another peak. Primarily, it allowed the crowd to see Terrell's depth of talent as a guitarist as he belted out searing, powerful riffs. After three straight funk songs, this miniature jazz orchestral was exciting and heavy hitting.

The band quickly responded after with an even greater display of its new versatility by playing "Skyline," a driving blues/jazz tune featuring back-up singer Anastasia Rene in the lead role. Her soulful, passion-filled voice rose above the crowd to the ceiling at the part of the concert where one can tend to drift off into space if the energy is not there. This ended with a collective thud, and with the excitement level high, the band slid into a five-song stretch of newer material.

This sequence, following the common trend of show, accumulated a greater energy level as time passed. One song that stuck out during this stretch was the smooth, shuffling melodies of "After All," which radiated the easy feeling of Nathan Wilson's Moog organ chiming, Joseph Farrell's soft, staccato picking, and Aaron Katz's light, methodical drumming. However, after this song ended, Percy immediately began to climb its funky trail towards the pinnacle of the show, wisely avoiding getting caught up in their own soloing and in turn, taking the edge away from their songs. What soon followed was the bouncing, funked-up "Wrong Side," which featured John Lezcesse's fat bass thumbing as a heavy bottom for Terrell's bubbly, acid-like, wa-wa guitar and Farrell's quick licks that grew more and more insane as time passed and culminated with a chaotic finish.

Percy entered the home stretch, with a drum-packed retooled rendition of "Chrissy Reed," which showcased the skills of Katz, Dole, Wilson and Rondina and led into a wild five-minute, adrenaline-filled, percussion adventure that ended the primary part of the concert in an explosive fashion.

For the encore, the original four members first came out by themselves and began with the slow grooved "Soggy Weather Skunk," flanked by the sweet whining of Farrell's slow, creeping guitar, and gradually the additional members began so slip back on stage and join in until the band was full once again. At once they dived into a climactic rendition of "Ammonium Maze" that served to be the culmination of the night, with every musician onstage playing faster and faster, until the excitement level reached a ridiculous height and then dropped to the floor. Percy Hill's new additions have made them a better live band. They have a tremendous amount of outlets to compliment their trademark energy now, and they show signs of growth and progress as artists, and none of slowing down. That is all that one can ask from a band in its live show.

Rockwell winds down at Big E this weekend

WEST SPRINGFIELD – As the Big E winds down this weekend, crowds scurry to the fair, desiring a last look at its shows and exhibits. "Norman Rockwell Paints America," an exhibit showcasing 322 of Rockwell's Saturday Evening Post covers, is just one such attraction.

The gallery covers his pieces from 1916 through 1963. Organized by the Norman Rockwell Museum (NRM) in Stockbridge, Mass., the exhibit begins by posting one of Rockwell's inspirational quotes: "I think I've always wanted to be an artist," it reads. "I certainly can't remember ever wanting to be anything else."

If a quote of such simplistic sincerity captures Rockwell's essence that well, then a nearby hanging photograph definitely zeroes in on his spirit. It's Rockwell painting the "Golden Rule" in 1961. He's got a pipe in his mouth and is holding five brushes in one hand as he paints with the other. He's sitting up straight. His knees are close together.

Willie Gillis, a character drawn during World War II, was based on a young man named Bob Buck, said Maurine Hart Henneffey, NRM Chief Curator. Rockwell debuted the character in 1941, showing Gillis joining the U.S. Army. For five years, Gillis arose in about 12 covers – the last one in October, 1946 – portraying him as a college attendee, supporting the G.I. Bill for schooling.

The Saturday Evening Post covers include some of Rockwell's best known art, explained Ellen Mazzar NRM publicist.

"It's one of the exhibits we have that travels around the country," said Mazzer. "And people recognize them. My father remembers delivering the Post when he was younger, so that's a whole generation that grew up seeing these images.

"Three times in the course of drawing these covers, Rockwell drew couples taking opposite positions in political debates," she explained. "The first one was in 1920. They are back to back, and you can see each one holding folded papers. His is folded for Cox. Hers is folded for Harding. And that election was the first time women had the right to vote in America, so that was the first time her opinion mattered. Rockwell captured that."

Soccer on the road again

UMass brings home momentum to 'Cuse

By Bob McGovern
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

It is never easy leaving home, especially after the Massachusetts women's soccer team collected its first victory at Rudd Field over Big 12 Conference opponent Iowa State. As the Minutewomen (1-6, 0-1 Atlantic 10) go on the road again, they face an interesting opponent in Syracuse (2-6-1), which has been going through its own set of growing pains.

"They are going through struggles this season as we are," Head Coach Jim Rudy said of the Orangewomen. Syracuse has suffered some losses on both sides of the ball, which has put a damper on high expectations in the always-competitive Big East. This leaves both sides playing with a lot of inexperience and an equal amount of desire as conference play is right around the corner.

On the field, UMass and Syracuse play a similar game - keep the ball away and setup for the kill.

"They like to knock it around," Rudy said of the Orangewomen's field presence. Syracuse also sports one of the smallest teams that the Maroon and White has seen this season, but that in no way takes away from its aggressiveness. Along with an aggressive, attacking style, Syracuse enjoys the presence of Canadian National team member Anne-Marie Lapalme, who was simply described by Rudy as, "deceptive."

Lapalme has not been a major point-scorer for the Orangewomen, but has been an intricate part in their offensive production. When questioned about her deceptiveness Rudy stated that Lapalme tends to "ghost out of the midfield." With this, UMass needs to pay attention to her positioning, as she tends to help set up many of the Orangewomen's scoring drives.

The goalie situation for Syracuse is something the Maroon and White needs to be wary of, as the Orangewomen have split time between two very differently-styled keepers. Emily Kowalczyk is the usual starter and is a 5-foot-3 keeper with very quick reaction skills. Coming off the bench is Shannon Myers who stands at 5-foot-10 and has a dangerous vertical capable of stopping shots in any corner of the net.

Adding to the interest of the game is the fact that several UMass players will be playing near their old stomping grounds, including Lindsey Bellini, last week's Dinn Brothers/UMass Athlete of the Week, and Tiffany Hamill. Coach Rudy was particularly interested in watching his girls respond to a somewhat familiar setting.

"They will be playing against girls they have played with and against...it should be interesting to see how they respond."

While on the subject of familiarity, Coach Rudy is particularly familiar with the head coach of Syracuse, UMass graduate and Hall of Fame inductee April Kater. Kater played soccer under Rudy while compiling an All-American career at UMass.

"I'm so proud of her, she is one of our people," Rudy said.

The Minutewomen have been a few steps slow recently but are hoping to get some support from Lindsey Bellini and captain Martha Conover - the only goal producers in the last two games. If there are no more health issues, which have been the plague of UMass this season, this weekend's game should be very evenly matched.

All familiarities aside, both teams are out for redemption for uncharacteristically slow starts. UMass is the last non-conference team Syracuse plays before attacking three straight Big East power schools: Miami, Providence, and Boston College.

After Friday's contest, UMass has to prepare for its second season, A-10 conference play. The Minutewomen go straight into the lion's den as they face off against Xavier and Dayton on the road. Both of these teams have shown promise to move into the A-10 postseason, but neither has stacked its schedule as UMass has this season.

The Maroon and White hopes that its experience with big conference opponents will help against smaller A-10 schools. This in no way means that the road is getting any easier, just more meaningful.

Desperate pair faces off

Wins a must as teams head into conference play

By Andrew Merrin
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

While it would be a stretch to call either team that will walk onto Rudd Field tomorrow at 1 p.m. desperate, neither club is in a comfortable position.

The Massachusetts men's soccer team (5-4-0) enters the match riding high off a 4-1 defeat of Maine last Saturday. Meanwhile, the Hartford Hawks (2-5-0) come to Amherst on the heels of a 4-0 loss at the hands of undefeated Yale.

Neither team has had a particularly impressive pre-conference season, with Hartford losing to the Bulldogs, Oneonta State (2-1), Hartwick (1-0), Michigan State (3-0), and Harvard (6-1). Meanwhile, the Minutemen struggled early, with losses to Navy (3-2 OT), Boston University (3-1), Michigan State (3-0), and New Hampshire (1-0).

Tomorrow's match represents the final one for both teams before the start of their respective conference schedules. The Hawks open their American East slate against Stony Brook, while the Minutemen begin the Atlantic 10 season with Xavier next Friday.

Hartford has been a victim of bad timing, with its two wins earned on a combined 8-3 score. Better distribution of those goals throughout the rest of its games might have meant a different Hawk team strolling onto the pitch tomorrow.

Meanwhile, UMass is a team that finds itself simultaneously rebuilding a defense, while trying to provide the offensive pop that, on paper, was expected all along. While the victory over Maine was convincing, most of the Maroon and White's matches this year have been hard fought, and won or lost on small mistakes.

The young defense, which looked exciting but green in early matches, has started to gain some confidence, making it more difficult for opponents to penetrate enough to create as many scoring chances as in the initial contests of the season. The transplanting of senior Derek Rhodes to the back line from midfield has given the defense an air of experience and consistency.

The transition of Rhodes has also allowed freshman Jason Scudamore to step up to defensive midfield, where he has shined. Scudamore scored his first collegiate goal against the Black Bears on Saturday on a mad dash move that he also tried against New Hampshire just a few days earlier. Add to that the scoring touch found in senior forwards Jeff Deren and Ptah Myers, and the Minutemen may see the scoreboard light up a little more.

The Hawks find themselves in a similar position, after losing 12 players to graduation last year. Defensively, the squad lost three starters, leaving junior Mike Santangelo as the only back to see the field for more than 13 games last year.

At midfield, Hartford has a solid crew of ball movers. Senior Peter Sjolin is second on the team in points with eight (2g, 4a), and junior Tim DeLoureiro has chipped in a goal and three assists, good for third in points.

Sophomore forward Alon Lubezky has been the standout for the Hawks, with six goals and two assists in six games. However, Hartford is having trouble finding goals from anywhere else, as sophomore Easton Wilson and senior Asaf Lubezky have contributed just one goal each.

Each squad will see tomorrow's game as one last chance to work out some kinks and get its season on the right track before heading into the all-important conference schedule.

ALANA discusses loss of resources for minority students

By Scott Enright, Pearl Gabel, and Lisa L. Robinson
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENTS

Alumni members of the Office of African, Latino, Asian/Pacific Islander, and Native American (ALANA) Affairs met on Saturday as a part of a day-long dialogue designed to discuss the future of minority programs at the University of Massachusetts.

The conference was called in the wake of budget cuts to minority support programs. The cuts resulted in the restructuring of these programs and the elimination of Academic Advising from minority affairs offices. These organizations now exist as social support programs with limited tutorial and counseling services available.

Alumni also met with Chancellor John Lombardi.

"We want to talk about ways to improve the quality of life for students of color," said alumnus Donald Brown, director of AHANA Affairs at Boston College, to Lombardi. "Our understanding now is that the University has departed from the Land Grant Institution, and has become largely middle class and wealthy students."

The Land Grant Act was passed in order to provide children of working class families access to a higher education. In 1863, UMass was founded under this principle.

"Minority students, for various reasons, are not graduating," alumnus Julien Tynes said to Lombardi. "We must seriously consider bringing back academic advising to these minority programs. These programs do work."

ALANA alumni questioned the firing of Ricardo Townes, vice chancellor of campus activities. Lombardi refused to comment on Townes.

"It's not appropriate or legal for me to comment on personnel issues," he said. "I do know this, the environment out there for support of at-risk students is not adequate."

The University-funded academic support programs that were downsized this year include: the Committee for the Collegiate Education of Black and other Minority Students (CCEBMS), the Bilingual Collegiate Program (BCP), the Native American Students Support Services Program (NASS) and the United Asia Learning Resource Center (UALRC). Those programs were under the direction of Townes. Associate Dean of Student Support Program and Enrollment Services Sidonio Ferreira now directs the programs.

Ferreira, who was not present at the meetings, said the programs were downsized because of budget cuts to the campus this year, and that they resulted in many job shifts. In addition to the firing of Townes, several academic counselors and directors were transferred to other advising centers on the campus.

Data from the ALANA Programs Committee Report of 2002 showed that 76.6 percent of African American, 100 percent of Cape Verdeans, 57.6 percent of Asians, and 63.4 percent of Latino came to the University because of the academic support programs.

"I am from the city, from a single parent home," said senior Political Science and African American Studies double major Johnette Ellis. "I have been struggling to pay tuition. I am struggling to find professors that care about me, and finding programs that can help make my situation stable. They took away my stability."

Immediately following the meeting with the chancellor, the ALANA Alumni and Community Teach-In was held in the Campus Center. It attracted little over fifty alumni and students.

The evening began with a keynote speech by Benjamin Swan, an UMass alumnus and state representative of the 12th Hampden District in Springfield.

"A lot of young people in college think that they are shielded from political process. They are not. It is going to affect them," he said.

The next speaker was Judge Luis Perez of the Worcester Juvenile Court. He encouraged students to get involved.

"This is not only an issue of people of color. It's an issue of diversity of people coming together for the common good," he said. "It's everyone's problem."

Representative Swan pointed out the importance of organizing within the community. "You really are going to have to do it for yourselves. Those of you who want to make a change...have to come together."

Hometown author visits Mt. Holyoke

By Adam Sutton
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Mt. Holyoke College celebrated the formal reopening of the Mt. Holyoke College Art Museum with the exhibition Changing Prospects: The View from Mt. Holyoke and a visit from Pulitzer Prize winning author, Tracy Kidder on Friday.

Kidder, the author of Hometown, a history of Northampton, spoke informally with Marianne Doezema, the Florence Finch Abbott Director of the Mt. Holyoke College Art Museum at the exhibition answered questions and then fielded audience questions.

The author touched on a number of issues including the significance Mt. Holyoke as a cultural icon for the surrounding community.

"Mt. Holyoke has become such an asset, a backdrop," Kidder said. "The irony about Northampton is it looks so benign. The view provides a mix of what America is and of a town that works seemingly well."

Kidder, a resident of Williamsburg, Mass., won the Pulitzer Prize for his book, The Soul of the Machine. His new book is in the finishing stages and has brought him to prisons and slums in Siberia, Haiti and Peru.

The Mt. Holyoke Art Museum just reopened after a great deal of renovation. The job, which began in 2001, cost the school approximately six million dollars. The renovation provided for an additional 3,800 square feet of Student struck by automobile

A student was struck by a car on University Drive on Friday, Sept. 22.

The incident happened around 7:30 p.m., according to Marina Grullon, a student who was passing by. The student was struck in the crosswalk between the Southwest horseshoe and yellow lot 22. Grullon was a few cars behind the accident, in the northbound lane and said the police and two ambulances showed up shortly afterward.

"We knew there was a person on the ground because there was a small crowd," said Grullon.

Grullon said there were about seven to ten people around the female, Caucasian student, who appeared to be conscious.

"She lifted her head up and the people around her said, 'No, put your head down'."

This is the second car-pedestrian accident at this particular crosswalk in a week. Last Monday, nineteen-year old Jessica Moody was struck at this same crosswalk and was treated for injuries at Bay State Medical Center. Please read The Collegian for continued coverage of this incident.

University considers new security measure

By Dan Lamothe
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Campus safety officials and the University of Massachusetts Police Department are mulling two new security systems, at least one of which would cost the University a minimum of $15 to $18 million if implemented.

"I don't see a way to make significant safety improvements without some financial cost," UMPD Chief of Police Barbara O'Connor said. "Our flagship campus should have something like this. It's a community concept."

O'Connor's comments came after Friday's demonstration and briefing with Security Products, Inc., of Rochester, New York. The company's "Security Escort" program is one of the two comparable options O'Connor and other safety officials are considering.

"This is a personal security device that they've implemented on two campuses," police spokesperson Jim Lyons said at the meeting. "It has some exciting potential."

The system, described as a multiple user help call system, is made up of five basic components: transmitters, receivers, alert units, transponders and a central console.

Each transmitter resembles a key chain. When two buttons are pushed together, the transmitter sends out a distress signal that is picked up by numerous receivers set up around campus. The signal is forwarded through transponders to the central console, where law enforcement or security authorities pick up calls of distress.

"It's reduced problems on the other campuses [where it has been installed]," John Seabold, president of Security Products Inc., said. "They've been able to stop situations from happening. Typically 50 percent of the problems will go away just from having the system."

According to Sam DeNoto, systems coordinator for Security Products, very few false alarms are registered with the system because transmitter users have to register their names and information to use the system. While there would be a charge per semester for students using it, he thinks it's affordable. "It's the cost of a textbook," DeNoto said.

Students would be charged a fee of somewhere between $75 and $95 a semester to use the system.

DeNoto said that the transmitters can only be tracked once students activate the alarm. When students engage the alarm, multiple receivers will pick up the signal at the same time. The system determines where the signal is coming from by a process called triangulation. It pinpoints where the signal is coming from by judging the strength of the signal at each receiver that picks it up.

According to Seabold, setting up a system like this at UMass would be a huge undertaking. To set up the system appropriately, there would be receivers on nearly every floor of every building and at least every 600 feet apart outside.

"You're talking thousands of receivers," he said.

O'Connor feels a system like this is necessary.

"We have no other system here than personnel and cameras," she said. "It's almost become a personal thing to do something more than what we have done.

"This is just a vision right now," O'Connor said. "It will really help. A lot of times we're dealing with fear crime. It has a great value in terms of crime prevention. This is going to put something in students' hands where they will be more likely to call right away."

O'Connor cited an example from last Thursday where students called in a complaint on two suspicious people in Patterson Dormitory who were reportedly shaking fourth floor door handles and asking people for marijuana. The two people were trespassed, identified and escorted off campus by University police.

"There are crimes that are prevented by calling right away," O'Connor said.

The Security Escort program is currently in place on two campuses. Security Products installed one system at Nazareth College in Rochester, New York six or seven years ago and another at Oswego State University of New York (SUNY) two or three years ago, according to DeNoto. Neither campus is anywhere near the size of UMass, however.

"The University needs to make a decision now that we've seen it," O'Connor said. "We need to decide what our next steps will be."

She said that a task force on crime recently formed by Chancellor John Lombardi and chaired by O'Connor will continue to look into the feasibility of the system at UMass.

gallery space providing more room for 17th, 18th, and 19th century art along with contemporary art that has remained in storage for the last decade.

"There is scarcely a surface in the museum that has not been changed and enhanced," Doezema explained.

The new exhibit, which also helps to kick off the re-opening runs Sept. 3 through Dec. 8 and has brought together approximately 100 objects that tell the story of the influence Mt. Holyoke has on artists and the community.

Among the paintings displayed was Thomas Cole's 1836 oil on canvas, View from Mt. Holyoke, Northampton, Massachusetts, after a Thunderstorm. Cole's painting, on loan from the New York Metropolitan Museum, was one of the first paintings to display the climactic view from the summit.

"We are indeed privileged to present this magnificent painting from the Metropolitan Museum's collection, a painting that is widely considered the most important American landscape," Doezema said.

In the 19th century, Mt. Holyoke was one of the most popular tourist destinations in America according to Doezema.

A New York Times article by Grace Glueck released to event attendees, described Mount Holyoke as 960 feet, and providing incredible views of the Connecticut River and the surrounding valley. In 1851, a hotel was built on the summit along with a gondola to get to and from the top. Among the artists to visit the summit were Emily Dickinson and Ralph Waldo Emerson, Glueck explained.

Doezma went on to praise Cole's painting, which displays two sides of the Connecticut River Valley.

"A combination of wilderness and cultivation," Doezema said. It was a very nationalistic view; it characterized the Old World with cleared land for farming while displaying the New World's asset of untamed wilderness, simultaneously. The marriage between the two was unthinkable in Europe. We had wilderness, which was the closest thing to god."

Today people still travel to the summit. The view has not changed much since Cole's time. Yes Rt-91 and the marina are in sight and Northampton has grown from its adolescence, but the majestic valley and the shaping river are still among most provocative features of the view.

In closing, Kidder commented in regard to his view of the area, "when you have a chance of going away for a month and then coming back to find that things look pretty much the same."

Remain objective:

report suspicions carefully

U-WIRE. CLEMSON, S.C. – On Friday the 13th, three men of Middle Eastern descent had the misfortune of finding out what superstitions are all about.

Ayman Gheith, Kambiz Butt and Omer Choudhary, all medical students en route to Miami to begin a nine-week course at Larkin County Community Hospital, were pulled over on the stretch of Interstate 75 known as Alligator Alley after a woman called authorities reporting that they had been carrying on a suspicious conversation in the booth next to her at a Shoney's restaurant in Calhoun, Ga. The men were detained for 17 hours and 20 miles of highway were shut down as bomb squad units fruitlessly scoured both cars in which the men had been traveling.

It is not surprising that Eunice Stone, the woman who tipped authorities off about the possible terrorists, reported what she believed to be suspicious activity, especially on Friday, Sept. 13, a date that had national security on the second highest level of alert. Americans are constantly reminded that it is better to be safe than sorry; that it is our duty to do whatever we can to help with the war on terror.

Stone was only doing what she thought was right. In her mind, she was being a responsible citizen, but she failed in one area. Instead of paying close attention to what was going on in the booth next to her and enlisting others to help her with these observations in order to be sure that she was not making a false accusation, she ran immediately to the nearest phone to call the authorities.

Stone's action was not one that resulted from thoughtful analysis, but was a knee-jerk reaction to the appearance of the men in question (Gheith wears traditional Muslim headgear and has a long black beard) and an imaginative interpretation of their eavesdropped conversation. In her haste, Stone let fear override logic. Her claims that she overheard the men saying that if Americans "were sad on 9/11, wait until 9/13," turned out to be completely untrue. Another of her speculations was that the men were discussing blowing up a building when they said: "Do you think we have enough to bring it down?" "If we don't have enough to bring it down, I have contacts and we can get enough to bring it down."

This also turned out to be false, and in fact, just a snippet of their conversation about shipping a car.

What Eunice Stone did was not wrong, but the way she did it was. She put words in the mouths of the men she accused and reported a crime she wasn't sure was even being committed. She did these things out of fear and prejudice of men who happened to fit the description of a stereotypical terrorist. The results of this action were shame and embarrassment for her and needless detention and loss of internships for them, not to mention the waste of police time and resources and inconvenience of motorists on I-75.

It is important for Americans to take real threats and suspicions seriously and to report them to authorities, but it is also important remain objective when distinguishing between real threats and irrational fears.

It's everyone's fault

CAREY

It was well past midnight when I went out to my car to recover some groceries I had left there earlier. Motivated by the night's soft air and moderate temperature, I decided to take a walk. No one, except myself, and a few weekday drunks returning home to bed, were walking around at this hour. I ambled up Orchard Hill, and made my way toward Amherst center.

The tacit serenity of my stroll was disrupted by the blue lights of a police cruiser that had pulled up alongside me.

"Its dangerous to be walking out so late don't you think?" the officer said to me in a low tone. "Not really," I thought.

I was, after all, a fairly robust male with a large burning stick in my hand (I was smoking a fat Caribbean cigar at the time), and anyone out to rob me would be sadly disappointed with the fruit of their labor.

"Have you heard what happened at Chadbourne the other night?" The officer asked. I told him I had and relayed to him the story about the run-in I had with a patrolman the previous night. He had slapped me with a $100 citation for walking through a fire door that was used with regular frequency by almost every occupant in my building. When I had protested this fact to the patrolmen he gave me a "sucks-to-be-you" smirk, and said that security was being tightened as a result of Monday's crime.

The policemen listened to my recent plight with unsympathetic ears. I asked him what department I could contact to contest the ticket. He said he didn't know. I stood next to his car and badgered him for news about the other crimes that had been occurring, on what seemed like a daily basis. I could tell by his stiff demeanor and the alertness in his face that the night had been attentive, but slow. We talked briefly before he slumped back into his car, and said before parting: "It's a shame."

It is a shame. Even in the rural backcountry of Western Massachusetts no one has the right to presume their safe. This is no longer the Amherst of Emily Dickinson's time. She probably could have taken many moonlit walks past dark farmhouses and empty stores to the town center. In those days an introverted writer could take a contemplative stroll without the least bit of worry from an unwanted disruption. That's obviously much different now. The times have long since changed, and people's attitudes have changed with them.

But who are these people? How do they justify their actions, and what is the cause for their proliferation? My mind searched for answers to these questions as I continued my walk. Was the angry rap music and lascivious TV programs inciting this awful behavior, or are these people the angry and lascivious inspiration for such expressions? Some think the former. They blame our uncensored art, and lack of old time religion for the slide in our generation's regard for humanity. According to these atavistic people, the news never used to report grizzly crimes, because, for them, there were no such crimes prior to 1963 (or at least a number so small that it could be ignored). Today, most of them watch "Leave it to Beaver" and "7th Heaven" from their sub-tropical winter homes, and pine for a golden age of morality to come.

Others point to drugs as the devil's advocate. Drugs, they say, have slithered their way into the mainstream by immigrants and minority gangs, which, in turn, rot the minds and productive inhibitions of middle class youth. Unfortunately, both of these misguided factions of people vote in large number.

The reasons for the increase in the awful events that have been happening, in my opinion, are not because of lewd entertainment, or rampant drug use (though these are repercussions). The true reason behind the rise in crime is the greed and frustration that comes with being poor. We live in a society that triumphs technological luxury and convenience, which makes life, for some, far more privileged than others. Our generation is engulfed in an ocean of superfluous consumer products. Those who can't afford these products and privileges are left to watch others enjoy a style of life vastly superior and far more opulent than their own. These feelings lead to a powerlessness that comes with the entrapment of poverty. For those unlucky enough to find themselves at the bottom, control exerted on something or someone by means of force and intimidation becomes the only avenue to vent their frustrations.

Records show a rapid rise in poverty and wealth disparity over the past 25 years, which coalesces with a steady increase in violent crime. These facts fit nicely into my hypothesis. The popularity of frustrated and angry lyrics sang by one-time crack dealers turned gangster rappers become clearer as well. As their fan base increases, it can be assumed that more people are relating to the ghetto lifestyle that they portray in their songs. So far the solutions to increased crime have been: stronger jail terms (especially for drugs), curtailment of civil rights for those financially less endowed and censorship of art that allegedly inspires violence. Logical solutions like increased government assistance for the poor are shunned as excuses for those to be lazy in a jobless economy.

In the age of technical advancement, confidence in our personal security has been lost. Vanity has replaced morality, even in the most obscure pockets of America. The fault for this lies in everyone. And to make it right requires greater understanding and sensitivity of the situation from all circles of society.

For the love of soccer

DAN YAGUDIN

Take an eastern MA town, add thousands of rabid Brazilian soccer fans, set the date to the morning before the World Cup final, and you have the following prediction:

Dan: Mom: "Because if they lose, I doubt there will be a population of Framingham."

The World Cup is a difficult time for my family. Of course, as many Israelis, we'd all love to see Israel make it to the world cup. By conventional prediction, that would be around the time Ariel Sharon and Yasser Arafat dance the passionate tango. Faced with this reality, my family is forced to pick other teams. And this is where the problems start.

My father, who grew up in a Turkish-Islamic country, has an affinity for the Turkish team. My older sister, who spent a semester abroad in Mexico, favors the team with the Sombrero-wearing fan base. My younger sister, who speaks Portuguese, favors the Brazilians, a love that is shared by my mother, who thinks Ronaldo is hot. My brother was recently bribed by a Mexican businessman who gave him the Mexican soccer jersey, and has moved from the Brazilian to the Mexican camp in the family. For me, this world was going to decide whom I favor.

If there is one thing I'd like to say about the team that eventually won the world cup (besides D-A-M-N), is that original soccer won. Brazilian soccer has its own style, its own flavor, and talent that can only be found in the beaches of Rio de Janeiro or the streets of Sao Paulo.

Brazilians, for one thing, don't really know what "defense" means. For them, a defensive team means six offensive players on the field instead of eight. But in the words of one of my Brazilian friends, "Why do we need a defense? So we suffer 1 or 2 goals, and score 7." This is not overlooked by other teams. In an interview before their game against Brazil, one of the Belgian defenders, Rio Ferdinand, was confident that the Belgians could stop Brazil's strongest player, Ronaldo.

"The problem," said Ferdinand, "is that besides Ronaldo, the Brazilians have Rivaldo, Ronaldinho, Roberto Carlos, and Cafu." Like every other team that went against them, the Belgians, too, fell to the Brazilian Samba this world cup.

This is not to say, of course, that there weren't any other teams that were worthy of note. The French, for instance, sucked. Badly. They didn't score one goal and were kicked out by the Danes. The Mexicans were loud. Throughout the World Cup their tens of thousands of fans were all singing the same songs, in one voice (hey Mexico, if you take requests, I want to hear a rendition of 'la cucaracha' in the next world cup). The United States discovered that we have a soccer team, and a damn good one at that.

Japan and South Korea took the first steps toward making Asia into a soccer empire. The Turkish team almost got to the semi finals, and before they were kicked out made for some excellent soccer and hardcore partying in Istanbul (a headline in an Israeli newspaper probably said it all: "World Cup 2002, Istanbul: no going home, no going to work, no sleep").

So in the end my family found itself partying with the thousands of Brazilians who converged onto downtown Framingham (I pity the people who didn't know it was World Cup final day), joining the party were Americans, Brits, Turks, Mexicans, and others whose teams submitted to the yellow and green. Whether you spelled it "soccer," or "futebol," or "football," you were there in the spirit of the sport. For their talent, their spirit, and most of all, their originality of play, (ok, ok, and for the fact that female Brazilian fans don't tend to wear much while rooting for their team).

I made 2 decisions: (1) Until the U.S. or Israel make it to the finals, I'm with Brazil, and (2) it was well worth getting up at 3:30am to watch the games. Here's to Germany 2006.

Letters to the Editor

To the Editor:

I would like to respond to two letters to the editor published in the Sept. 19, 2002 edition of The Collegian, both of which addressed the recent sexual assault in Central.

One letter writer claimed to be "appalled" that the UMPD would even consider suggesting that women on campus take some personal responsibility for their own safety by taking a self-defense class, and further asserts the UMPD is blaming women for being attacked. Women were certainly NOT being accused of attracting attacks; the police were merely providing women suggestions on how to protect themselves. As a RAD (Rape and Aggression Defense) grad, I believe it is not only responsible for security to recommend RAD, but irresponsible NOT to take every opportunity to put it before the female students. We can't expect the UMPD to tail us at all times, guns drawn, any more than we expect our mommies and daddies to hold our hands 24/7.

Another letter suggested security booths be set up at all times. Let's see – about 40 booths, 24 hours a day, at $6.75 an hour – that doesn't sound too bad until you figure this will cost about $45,000 a week! Where, do you suggest, the college comes up with the money or the workers for that? I find it interesting how many people turned out for the rally about budget cuts, complaining how their classes have been cut and there are too many students in a room, can then turn around and expect the college to fund 24 hour coverage of every dorm.

The suggestion the attacker "may have even been a maintenance worker for UMass" is a gross generalization. Sure, it could have been. It could just as easily have been a student, faculty member or an unknown intruder. No doubt would the writers rethink the decision to prohibit certain workers from building after hours if they got stuck in an elevator at 3 a.m., maybe even one that had been vomited in! Suggesting to "reject" personnel's cards after working hours is preposterous. It disgusts me how the two writers managed to insult two of the hardest working departments on campus all in one shot. I think, perhaps, we would all do well to show them a bit more respect; without them, this campus could never function

To suggest security is blaming women for sexual assaults or to randomly name an overworked, underappreciated department like maintenance as a possible source of attackers and to expect that the nebulous "they" should protect us is juvenile, irresponsible and serves no purpose other than to divert attention from real solutions.

Umpteenth remake of The Four Feathers light as a feather

By Jake D. Lewis
COLLEGIAN STAFF

THE FOUR FEATHERS
Directed by Shekhar Kapur
Starring Heath Ledger, Wes Bentley and Kate Hudson
Playing at CineMark 12 in Hadley

It has been a common trend of late that film directors who make a huge impact on the cinema with their debut movie cannot copy the same success with their follow-up. Look at what happened to John Madden, the Academy-Award winner for Shakespeare In Love: he went into his sophomore slump with the abysmal Nicolas Cage drama Captain Correlli's Mandolin last summer. Sam Mendes, who helmed American Beauty returned this past summer with the Tom Hanks vehicle Road to Perdition, which was by no means a disaster, but a disappointment to many from two such talented men.

Shekhar Kapur, similarly, is another young director who burst onto the scene with 1998's Elizabeth, a movie that (dare I say it?) made British history exciting. The film was nominated for a slew of awards and brazenly stated that Kapur had a lot of potential in Hollywood.

Which leads us to his new film, The Four Feathers, based on the novel by A.E.W. Mason. The movie has been remade several times, but a new revitalization by Kapur gives it an interesting spin once more. The director was born and raised in India when it was controlled by the British, and since The Four Feathers is all about British expansionism and rule, it could have given the traditional story a rather unconventional angle. Disappointingly, the original story is left intact and remains convoluted, much like its predecessors and the novel on which it is based. Chicago Sun-Times film critic Roger Ebert stated in his review of this movie that, "The less you know about the British Empire...the more you will like [the movie]." His comment is mostly true; because while the film is at times exciting and moving, there is a nagging sensation left over from the apparent absence of invention and political correctness. Luckily, with a target-audience aimed at a younger crowd, judging by its youthful stars, British history is probably not at the forefront of the viewer's mind.

But to the story itself: Harry Faversham (Ledger) is engaged to be married to the beautiful Estine Eustace (Hudson) when he learns that his group of soldiers in the British army are shipping out to act as reinforcements in the Sudan where a fort has been taken over. Whether it's due to Harry's upcoming wedding, or just out of plain fear, it's never made truly clear why he abandons his friends and leaves the army. Each of these "friends" sends him a white feather, symbolizing cowardice and then later his wife-to-be does the same. With these four feathers in hand, and being disowned by his gung-ho father, Harry sets off for the desert to return each feather to the friends who slighted him, to prove that he's no wimp, and to save his friend Jack (Bentley) in the process. Jack has not given up hope on Harry, and clings to the idea that the latter is still a good soldier and honest person, yet the same cannot be said for Jack since he wastes no time in romancing Harry's fiancee. This plot inconsistency sounds like something out of The Count of Monte Cristo, yet is much more bothersome here, because deep down the audience wants to like Jack, but when he suffers a Jane Eyre twist of fate towards the film's climax, we can't help but think that he had it coming.

As the audience follows Harry's journey through the bloodshed and destruction of the war in the desert, it's impossible not to compare it to today's ongoing lead in Afghanistan. Heck, even Harry looks like John Walker Lindh, unkempt hair and all, the American soldier who fought for the Taliban. But the similarities don't end there either: Harry befriends the "enemy," who is not doing anything evil, but merely protecting their land invaded by the British. Here is where Kapur could really have wowed the crowds (not to mention the Academy honchos), because one tends to side with the natives of the Sudan rather than the British in the struggle. It could be argued that Kapur was trying to such a point that the British expansion was wrong), but if he is, it's much too subtle and vague. Harry teams up with a slave named Abou Fatma (Djimon Hounsou), who continues to save the Brit's butt, but there's a good deal of head-scratching in this relationship. Why would Abou want to help a member of the people who are oppressing him? His only explanation is that he does what God puts in his way, which makes one further think that he worships some unwaring and vicious deity, which is definitely not what the film is trying to go for.

What the film does succeed at, and where Academy voters will take notice, are the exquisite costumes, set design and cinematography. The bright red outfits of the British soldiers stand out on the barren desert, while the cinematographer evokes that of an epic on the scale of Lawrence of Arabia. It's only a small coincidence that the latter film has been recently re-released in theatres for its 25th anniversary. The Four Feathers is by no means comparable to that legendary, if not outdated, film, but there is both a sense of homage to it, as well as trying to make historical drama like it once again accessible to the audiences who the movie targets and are too young to know what came before.

All three primaries are not English: two are American and one is Australian. This proves to be a very small distraction, all carrying off their roles with great aplomb. The best scene is when the British army is surrounded by a horde of incoming Sudan warriors, and this moment can also be compared to the ultimate fate of the film. For while Kapur is a strong and fresh, young voice on the battlefield of Hollywood, the pressures of the movie studio, the audience expectations and the material he was working was too much of a fight to succeed against.

Don't fight the force of Gravity. Employing vintage equipment over a distinct alt-rock sound, Our Lady Peace's latest is a recent masterpiece

Our Lady of Peace's Gravity promises to pull you in

By Johnny Donaldson
COLLEGIAN STAFF

OUR LADY PEACE
Gravity
Columbia

Most alternative rock floating on the airwaves nowadays is indistinguishable. I can't tell one moaning voice and churning guitar from the other. When I heard "Somewhere Out There," the first single from Our Lady Peace's fifth album Gravity, however, I immediately pegged it as an OLP song. The band has a more distinctive sound than the rest of the alt-rock pack, thanks to lead singer Raine Maida. Maida has one of the most unique voices in the rock industry, a voice that alternates between a nasal moan and an emotion-racked roar. "Somewhere Out There" took my attention more immediately than, say, whatever the new of Puddle of Mudd song was. Of course, "Somewhere Out There" is also a good song. It's a power ballad, yes, but one that is both brawny and tightly constructed. With soaring backgrounds and Maida's searing, emotion-wracked vocals, it's one of the year's best modern rock songs.

I resisted when I just listened to Gravity, plunking it down with the rest of the lousy masses plaguing rock radio (Seether, eh, all). The album is more transparently commercial than the rest of OLP's oeuvre. Half of their last album, Spiritual Machines, contained snippets of dialogue by sci-fi philosopher Robert Kurtzweil and contained a song with the lyric "big green monkey" every one's a junkie." Gravity, however, doesn't stray too far from decidedly mainstream territory. The album has the same kind of muscular melodies of fellow Canucks Nickelback and Default. I was about to write off Gravity as a decently boring album with a couple of good songs on it — until I started to listen closer.

At first listen, it was a dud. But after three or four listens, it began to grow on me. Sure, for all but one song, Gravity proudly struts around, meddling in its true colors of a mostly perfect album.

OLP have long been famous in their native Canada, ever since their debut Naveed in 1945. In their homeland they have scored multiple Juno Awards (the Canadian equivalent of the Grammy) and large record sales. Now they appear to be ready to conquer American soil after having established a cult following. Gravity debuted at No. 9 on the Billboard charts in June (opposite stiff competition from metal kingpins Korn and Papa Roach) and has sold 300,000 copies so far. They are now ready to be launched into the rock stratosphere.

The band started Gravity with a new guitarist (Steve Mazur, replacing Mike Turner) and a new producer (Bob Rock, who has worked with bands like Metallica and The Cult). They recorded over ten weeks, using vintage equipment used by the likes of Metallica and Pete Townshend. The result is a controlled specimen of a masterpiece.

The album kicks off with the metallic crunch of "All for You." Over gritty guitar and growling bass lines Maida sings about a distant father more into discipline than love; his voice a searing groan. "Do You Like It?" a kiss-off to a controlling lover, shifts and rumbles. The anthemic "Innocent" touches on a quality not inherent in most modern rock: positivism (a trait also found in OLP songs like "Life" off Spiritual Machines). The band touches into the angst of their young followers with Johnny, who wishes to be a famous musician and Tina, who wants to be beautiful. OLP don't sulk here, they go for uplift, in both the lyrics and the music. They do the same on "Made of Steel," with gut-powered music backing Maida's promises to stand by whomever the song is about.

OLP slow down on "Not Enough," a grunge esque moan that starts quiet in the verses and opens big in the chorus. It's a stale formula, sure, but the stalest of formulas can still taste good if done proper. "Sell My Soul" has some (very) minor Goth-meets-grunge-meets-alternative flourishes, opening with eerily wavy bass and launching into a chorus full of yearn. "Sorry" may be the most commercial sounding song, another kiss off tune, played with vaguely popped up rock backing. And still it succeeds. OLP ends fallen on "Bring Back the Sun," a prog-inspired slip up that floats away into the ether.

Gravity, at first listen, doesn't sound like something that will remain in a CD player for more than, oh, a day or two. But don't burn it right away — this is one that will slowly hook into your brain and not let go. If you give it the chance. Give it the chance.

Osborne's signature curls were bouncing, just as were her devoted fans as the star performed an hour-and-a-half variety of heartfelt songs at Pearl Street last Thursday night.

Joan Osborne visits and revisits

JOAN OSBORNE
Sept. 26

NORTHAMPTON – Joan Osborne, the woman who painted a humanized portrait of God, gave life to a mellow, modest-sized crowd at Pearl Street Thursday night. With a sultry, informal tone, Osburne and her five-piece band dellvered an hour-and-a-half variety ol unreserved tunes. After crossing a spectrum of genres from rock to pop, dipping into folk and emerging into soul, Osborne and Co. said goodnight to a sea of smiling faces.

Her signature curls bouncing, Osborne was loose and comfortable on stage. In red Pumas, cotton pants and displaying home-state pride with a well-worn Kentucky Wildcats T-shirt, she made the audience feel like they were hanging out in her living room.

"Thanks for coming out in the rain to check us out," she said humbly before mentioning she would mix up the night with the soul covers off her new album, How Sweet It Is, and, "old songs with new twists."

With closed eyes and swaying hips, Osborne's first touch of her 1995 pop/rock album, Relish was an elegant rendition of "St. Teresa." A pleasant change from the largely male-dominated music scene, Tracy Wormworth played a solid bass while Sissy Ctero backed up Osborne on vocals. The singer made multiple, gracious introductions to her crew and all, including drummer Tony Mason, lead guitarist Andrew Perillo and keyboardist George Lax, had a chance to shine solo.

A background of blue and red lights helped create a psychedelic atmosphere as the casual vocalist gripped the microphone shaft seductively during softer pieces like "Only You Know and I Know," and the infamous, "One of Us." The crowd's reaction to the former was mixed, some wanting to reinforce that they were real fans, not just the pop chart tag-alongs to which the song is most widely received. The under-capacity mass was an intimate and faithful one. They highlighted their devotion with constant lip-synching and shout-outs: "You're a goddess!" one fellow declared, but was not regarded by its proprietor. The group was mixed; young and old, couples of all types danced and held each other during the frequent love ballads. Constant water breaks in which Osborne spoke to the audience helped contribute to the almost yoga retreat-esc feel of the show. The band appeared equally as chill, smiling among themselves and enjoying Osborne's stage presence. At times however, it felt almost too casual, as the singer appeared dazed or even a few planets away.

A funkier side emerged when Aretha Franklin's popular tune,"Think," and "The Weight" shook up the room. Osborne enjoyed playing to and with the crowd, as she pointed and motioned a spectator to, "Take a load off," and "Put the weight on me!" She was jovial and appreciative throughout the set, once startling over, "Wait, wait. I totally messed this up... I want to make it nice for you – you've come out in the rain."

With a Grammy nomination, a music video and almost universal industry recognition following Relish, Osborne enjoyed success. But the pressures of producing the follow-up and artistic clashes in the studio caused her to be dropped from PolyGram Records. After national tours and a stint on the Lilith Fair, she signed with Interscope Records to produce her eclectic sophomore disc Righteous Love in 2000. How Sweet It Is, on the same label, was released on Sept. 17.

Osborne left the stage to the album-titled "James Taylor" song, perhaps signifying how much she had taken pleasure in the evening's interaction. She was instantly called back by her devoted and was at her best, most focused, during the encore. She was crisp and composed to end the show with a breathtaking cover of "To Make You Feel My Love." As rain fell outside, within the dark basement tears dropped from the singer's face and all were reminded how sweet it is.

Demolition String Band, a bluegrass crew from Hoboken, New Jersey, opened the show to a warm reception. They performed most songs from their Okra-Tone Records disc, Pulling Up Atlantis.

Read this now to lose weight now: Energy intake vs. energy expenditure

According to 1999 statistics, about 61 percent of adults in the United States were overweight or obese. Obesity is one of the main contributing factors associated with heart disease, type 2 diabetes, arthritis, high blood pressure, psychological disorders like depression, and some forms of cancer. Obesity is no longer an adult disease; its prevalence has nearly tripled among adolescents within the past two decades. There are a number of factors associated with maintaining a healthy body weight. These include genetics, body composition, environment, and physical activity and its relationship to metabolism, as well as excess calorie intake.

GENETICS AND METABOLISM

Calorie expenditure is not completely dependent on exercise. Metabolism is an involuntary activity that affects an individual's ability to burn calories. When you are awake and resting, calories are burned just to keep you alive; this is considered your resting energy expenditure (REE).

The REE between men and women is significantly different. A woman's metabolism is 10-15 percent slower than a man's because males naturally have more muscle mass, while females have a greater proportion of body fat.

In addition, hormone activity, like the hormones produced by the thyroid gland, establish overall metabolic rate. Body composition, unlike genetics, can be altered to some extent.

BODY COMPOSITION AND METABOLISM

REE naturally decreases with age because of muscle mass loss. As a result, weight loss at a younger age is easier to accomplish. In general, losing body weight from fat or muscle lowers daily REE. It should be noted that at rest fat burns approximately 12 calories per hour versus muscle, which burns about 30-35 calories per hour. Therefore, maintaining body weight while decreasing fat and increasing muscle will raise REE greatly.

ENVIRONMENT AND METABOLISM

The fast and most modifiable factor for REE is environment. Certain stimulants can elicit a response in metabolism. Two of these that are used on a day-to-day basis are caffeine and nicotine. It has been reported in studies that two to three cups of coffee can raise REE as much as 12 percent. Cigarettes, which contain nicotine, also stimulate metabolism. People who smoke cigarettes often experience a weight gain after quitting. This may be due to a decrease in REE, as well as increased caloric consumption.

Temperature is another major environmental factor affecting metabolism. In cold environments, the combination of releasing certain hormones (i.e. adrenaline) and shivering can increase REE up to 400 percent. REE is raised in warmer environments due to increased cardiovascular activity and sweating.

PHYSICAL ACTIVITY AND METABOLISM

As you can see from the examples above, your metabolic rate is regulated by a number of factors. Exercise, in general, will increase your metabolic rate. When you exercise your body releases stored fuels to aid in energy production. Remember, your body composition greatly affects how many calories you burn in a typical day. Therefore, the more muscle mass you have, the more calories you will burn because muscle is metabolically active. Resistance exercise is the best way to increase muscle mass, while aerobic activity is better to increase your circulatory system and strengthen your heart.

However, exercising is just one part of the picture. In order to maintain a healthy body weight, you must match your energy intake with your energy output.

EXCESSIVE CALORIE INTAKE = SUPER-SIZED WAISTLINES

The average adult consumes about one million calories per year. The human body has evolved to be a highly efficient system, which is the reason why excessive caloric intake leads to weight gain. For example, if you were to eat just over 50 calories every day of your energy expenditure, you could expect to gain about five pounds of additional fat per year. This is equal to just five potato chips.

Everyone knows that fast food is not the healthiest option, yet millions of people visit fast food restaurants everyday. Although fast food is not the only way people get too many calories, it is a major contributor.

If you were to go to Wendy's and order a Classic Single Burger Value Meal, you will probably meet half of your allotted calories for a single day, given you were an average adult on a 2000-calorie diet. One Classic Single, with all the fixings, has about 410 calories, a Biggie fry has about 470 calories, and a 22-fl. oz regular soda has about 277 calories, for a whopping total of 1157 calories. Now if you were to Biggie Size that order, the total calories would increase to about 1585 calories.

Burger King burger's are flame broiled so does that make them healthier? Not exactly. A BK Whopper with cheese contains about 850 calories. If you ordered the Value Meal, which includes a large fry and 22 fl. oz soda, your meal total has been raised to 1630 calories. King-sizing that meal would bring the calorie total to about 1850. Going for chicken instead of beef is a healthy alternative. Yet, one chicken whopper at BK still has about 580 calories. If you add a fry and regular soda to that, you can see that you have turned that healthier option into a not-so healthy one. You can imagine the effect King-sizing this meal.

Subway has been marketing itself as a healthy alternative to other fast food chains. What they fail to tell you in the commercials, or mention in small print, is that you cannot have a regular soda, extra condiments (i.e. cheese or mayo), or a 12" sub to consider it a low-fat or low-calorie meal. One 12" roasted chicken breast sub has about 622 calories, without cheese or mayo. Without chips, if you added a medium 22 fl. oz regular soda to that meal, it has just been increased to 900 calories. Even worse is the signature Subway 12" meatball sub, which has about 1000 calories.

Starting The Week Off On A Healthy Foot

with Christopher Theberge and Joseph Cannon

As you can see from the examples above, fast food can really pack a calorie-punch. Value Meals and supersizing seems like a great value when you consider the cost of creating your own meal versus one suggested to you. There is nothing wrong with going to fast-food joints once in awhile. The problem lies when you frequent these places too often. I only mentioned total calories here, but I should remind you that these places not only offer a lot of calories but high amounts of total fat, particularly saturated, and cholesterol.

So what does it take to burn off a Whopper, French fries, or a sub everyday? Let me ask you this. "While you supersize those meals, are you also supersizing your exercise routine?" To burn off an average value meal (approximately 1500 calories) you could choose from any of the following activity options:

- Run 15 miles in 2 1/2 hours (10 minute/mile pace).
- Climb flights of stairs for 7 1/2 hours.
- Walking at a light to moderate pace for 10 hours.
- Drive your car for 13 1/2 hours.
- Stand up for 15 hours.

As you can see from these examples, it takes an excessive amount of activity to burn off those calories. So does this mean that you should never eat at a fast food place ever again? No.

If you were to go to these places, I would first tell you to look at the calorie content of the foods that you intend to purchase. Going to www.fatcalories.com is a great resource. Once you see the nutritional information for your meal, you may be less apt to go and order it. Also, you may also end up trying something you have never tried before, or find items that you never knew they had. Another tip would be to bring the exact change for your meal, therefore you will not be able to supersize it. Ordering diet soda is a great way to lower your meal's calorie content. Calories do add up and despite what people may say, it does have an impact. Entering these places when extremely hungry may prompt you to order a supersized value meal, along with a dessert or two. Finally, set a goal of visiting these places only once a week or once every two weeks. When you crave a McDonald's French fry, go eat some fruit or have a baked potato instead.

All in all, eating too many calories, while not being physically active, is the two main causes of weight gain. If you eat too many calories, you must also boost your exercise routine to compensate for this. Adjustments in nutrition, exercise, and overall lifestyle are the best solution. Eat moderate amounts and adjust your day-to-day activities to reflect changes in diet. Be Healthy!

Hall re-opens

Basketball Hall of Fame makes magical return

ADAM LEVOY

This weekend, the new and improved Basketball Hall of Fame had its grand re-opening in Springfield, Mass. All one has to do to see it is take a ride down route 91 South. You will know that the new $103 million structure means business.

The old Basketball Hall of Fame was a mere disgrace to the sport. My first time up to UMass I did not even know I had passed it until my brother said, "Um Adam, did you see the Hall of Fame on the left?" It was an old sickly shaped building with ugly orange banners coming down the side of the building. The building looked like it fit in perfectly with the Dr. Funk Nike commercials that aired during the NBA playoffs last spring with its retro 70s style. Well, with the grand reopening, the funk is back!

As you approach the building, which was constructed right next door to its former home, you will see a gigantic sphere that looks like a basketball. It almost looks like a planetarium. It is so big!

The sphere is white, not orange like a basketball, because there will be color coordinated lights that will change colors according to the occasion. Just as the Empi.c State Building has been lit red, white and blue since Sept. 11, the sphere will be lit the national colors as well.

For example, Magic Johnson was inducted into the Hall of Fame this past week. I would not be surprised to see colors of gold and purple lighting up downtown Springfield. If the Celtics make it to the playoffs this year (once they find a point guard), it will most likely be lit emerald green.

To fit the 21st century and the age of computers, the theme of the Hall of Fame will be fan interaction.

There is a life size court on the floor of the main sphere with many baskets to shoot from, including a peach basket which is how this great game started over 100 years ago by James Naismith.

Fans will be able to sit in a booth and re-enact great NBA moments with their own color commentary. Yes, even now I can call all those heartbreaking, frustrating loses my Knicks have made me suffer through over the years. I just hope they do not bleep out what I say!!

New inductees for the 2002-year include all time greats, such as Magic Johnson, Drazen Petrovic (the late Croatian sensation who paved the way for international players in the sport), coaches Larry Brown and Lute Olson, Kay Yow and the Harlem Globetrotters.

To see these new inductees and the experience the rich history of the sport of basketball, go down to the Basketball Hall of Fame in Springfield General Admission is $15.

good enough for any Major League Baseball Stadium – ready to take its place in the upper deck of Carter-Finley. White shirts were the minority, but had their place on both sides of the field, giving eyes just enough of a break from the glowing red of the rest of the stadium.

The student section? All red. Five thousand or more screaming students, all in unison, as if the chants they screamed are something they have known since coming out of the womb. This is second nature in North Carolina. This is ACC football.

As the video montage introduced the team, the tunnel that it gathered in to prepare to run onto the field suddenly filled with smoke as if it were part of a WWE introduction. As the marching band created a path for the troops to run through, fireworks shot off as the crowd roared in appreciation of its team.

With 51,221 fans screaming for nearly every play, it is easy to see why the Minutemen might have been a little edgy for the game. Especially since nearly every one of those fans yelled "FIRST DOWN!" in unison with the PA announcer every time the Pack got a new set of downs.

"I'm sure everyone's nervous with a caliber game like this, but you've got to step it up," junior Jeremy Cain said.

But amid all the atmosphere and seeming thirst for blood, there was a distinct air of class among the NCSU faithful. As Minuteman offensive lineman O.J. McBride was being carted off the field on a back brace in the third quarter, all those in attendance rose to their feet for the entire time that McBride was being taken to the ambulance. Not just when he was lifted off the field. Not just as he was loaded onto the cart. But until he was placed in the ambulance.

"I thought it was a great trip," Massachusetts Head Coach Mark Whipple said. "The crowd was good, they had a lot of class here. Their kids played hard, our kids played hard. I'd come back down here anytime."

But along with the intensity and power of the fans, stadium and overall atmosphere, came something that Whipple referred to as the 12th man – ACC officials.

"You know that's going to happen," said Whipple, in reference to the majority of calls going against the Minutemen. "That's why they're a conference. [The officials] are going to protect them. I think the Atlantic 10 ought to learn something from it.

"Your kids are fighting hard and I was just trying to plead with the officials," he continued. "I was very close to running out on the middle of the field and getting a 15-yard [penalty] just to try to protect our kids."

This is a distinct change from the two non-conference games that UMass hosted, where the Minutemen were called for 24 penalties as compared to their opponents' 12.

"Why doesn't the Atlantic 10 learn from them?" Whipple asked. "We play against AIC and Central [Connecticut] and they didn't call anything for us."

After all, this is ACC football.

But not everything is better in the ACC, according to Whipple.

"What do you guys think?" Whipple asked the media following the loss. "I think we've got a better press room at UMass and I think we've got a better band. They certainly have better players and better officials."

ACC powerhouse N.C. State calls Carter-Finley Stadium in Raleigh its home. The capacity of 51,500 is a far cry from the 17,000 capacity at UMass' McGuirk Alumni Stadium in Amherst.

COURTESY N.C. STATE MEDIA RELATIONS

In front of the NCSU faithful Saturday, Heisman candidate Philip Rivers threw 4 TD's vs. UMass.

■ N.C. State

UMass cut the lead to 28-10 after a diving touchdown grab from Zullo and a Doug White field goal, but State's Lamont Reid brought the ensuing kickoff back 97 yards for a touchdown, killing any momentum the Minutemen may have been picking up and extending the Wolfpack lead to 25.

"[Kicker] Doug [White] has got to do a better job of pinning the ball," Whipple said. "We have to have somebody who will make a tackle."

The Minutemen had a shot to make the score 35-17 before the half, but Krohn's pass went through Cobbs' hands in the endzone. UMass did cut the lead to 18 in the third quarter when linebacker Jeremy Cain tipped an attempted screen up in the air. Dorian Davis hauled the errant pass in and rumbled 58 yards into the endzone.

"We were just hustling to the ball and good things happened," said Cain, who ended the day with nine tackles, including two for loss.

Rivers connected with receiver Bryan Peterson on a nine-yard slant to cap off State's next drive and extend the lead to 41-17. McLendon and sophomore Josh Brown pounded the ball for 48 yards to set up the score.

State scored twice more, once on a McLendon three-yard touchdown run and again on a blocked punt returned by Reid.

Krohn connected with Pechler down the sidelines for a 50-yard score to round out the scoring.

"We had a couple different versions of [that play] and we ran it until we got it right," Krohn said.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20- Feb. 18) Stop occupying your time worrying about things that don't matter. In the long run, your agitated nature will only cause all of your hair to fall out.
PISCES (Feb. 19- March 20) - All of the things that seem unclear within your life will become more apparent at the beginning of this week. The stars hold good things for you when it comes to love.
ARIES (March 21- April 19) - Despite what anyone tells you to the contrary deodorant is a necessary part of getting ready in the morning. Repeat that mantra.
TAURUS (April 20- May 20) - Today is the day to wash your clothes. You are starting to just wear the dirty clothes to school and are becoming that person no one wants to sit near; change your life.
GEMINI (May 21- June 20) - All Gemini's are funny and wonderful people who should visit their friends at UMass much more often than they do.
CANCER (June 21- July 22) - You have a tendency to drown your sorrows away with alcohol, however today is not the day to do it. Your parents are making a surprise visit, it is time to get free money.
LEO (July 23- August 22)- Go home and watch a movie like Donny Darko and think about how much better your life is than the main character's life, that should cheer you up.
VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) - Tell everyone it is your birthday today and cash in on the free loot. Despite whether or not anyone believes you at the very least you get points for being industrious.
LIBRA (Sept. 23- Oct. 22) - Start going to classes. Failing out of school will only leave you homeless and sleeping in a cardboard box on the side of the road at which point you will need more guidance than this horoscope can provide.
SCORPIO (Oct. 23- Nov. 21)- When you are at your lowest go disco bowling, it couldn't hurt right? Today might be a day in which you require bowling, the stars predict bad things for you.
SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22- Dec. 21)- Keep an open mind today, someone you do not have a good relationship with may win you over.
CAPRICORN (Dec. 22- Jan. 19)- Because of your take-charge attitude your sign of the zodiac is often put under a great deal of pressure, especially in the work force. Take the time to breathe and all will be well.

UMass blanks Hawks; prepares for conference

By Andrew Merritt
COLLEGIAN STAFF

There's nothing like a blowout to put a hop in the step of a soccer team, especially when that soccer team is entering its crucial conference season in less than a week.

The Massachusetts soccer team found that hop on Saturday, when it dismantled the Hartford Hawks, 6-0, at Rudd Field.

UMass needed only one first half goal from senior Jeff Deren to take the victory. Deren took a feed from senior Yuri Morales, moved to just within the penalty box, and put a rolling shot past Hartford keeper Ryan Carr at the 38:44 mark. Hartford and UMass played a very even first half, with few signs of what was to come in the second period.

Once the teams took the field for the second half, however, the floodgates opened.

At 64:18, junior Dan Colwell scored on a free kick from senior Derek Rhodes, who put the ball in the air for Colwell and Deren, both waiting just outside the keeper box. Both players were in the air to put a head on the ball, but Colwell was the last to touch it, and was given the goal, with Deren getting the assist.

The goal was Colwell's first of the season, and it would be just the beginning for the Minutemen.

Just over two minutes later, Morales took an aerial ball from Colwell and headed it in for his third goal of the season. At 70:24, Rhodes continued the scoring spree with a clever free kick shot that snuck under the reach of a diving Seth Shipon, Hartford's keeper for part of the second half.

After Hartford replaced Shipon with junior Kurtis Perdelwitz, the Minutemen continued to pepper the Hawks' goal, including an excellent scoring chance for Morales, who popped the ball just over the bar.

As the shadows got longer, along with Hartford's comeback chances, UMass Head Coach Sam Koch began substituting a few unfamiliar faces into the mix, and sophomore Oral Bullen, who has become increasingly dangerous in recent games, netted his first goal of the season when Perdelwitz misplayed a long aerial ball, giving Bullen the opportunity for a wide open header at 86:24.

Junior Devlin Barnes polished off the rout with his first tally this season, on a rebound from senior Tiago Moriera at 87:32. It was Moriera's first assist of the 2002 campaign.

For a team that had struggled early in the season, a 6-0 victory to follow up a 4-1 win over Maine just a week ago was a very welcoming sight.

"Six-nothing win, it's a lot more fun," Koch said. "We were fortunate in the very beginning, they missed a couple of chances and then never had another chance after that."

With the win, UMass improves to 4-4-0 this year. Hartford drops to 2-6-0.

Senior UMass keeper Enzo Altomare made a strong case for winning the starting job with his performance, turning away nine shots on goal. The defense in front of Altomare also made the clean sheet a reality, with strong play from Rhodes, sophomore Chris Canierota, and freshman Jason Scudamore.

As for Hartford, which came out of the gates looking nothing like a 2-5 team, the second half spelled trouble, when the squad lost the spirit it showed in the first frame.

"It was an excellent second half," Koch said. "I'm not sure what happened to Hartford."

"They dropped their heads after the third goal, and it was over," Rhodes said.

While momentum went back and forth throughout the first half, and even five minutes through the second half, increased scoring chances for the Minutemen – capped off by Colwell's goal – brought all of the swing to the Maroon and White side.

Hartford's lone bright spot was sophomore Easton Wilson. The speedy forward kept pressure on UMass for most of the game, but never got enough on the ball to change the number in Hartford's score box.

The Minutemen will walk back onto Rudd Field Friday with high hopes against Xavier. The Musketeers recorded the 200th victory in the program's history with a 3-2 win over Wisconsin yesterday.

Said Rhodes, "We can't get complacent because of this game. It's the Atlantic 10 now, and everyone comes to play."

RALEIGH, N.C. – Being a college football program's poster boy isn't always as much fun as it sounds.

UMass	24

Following Saturday's 56-24 loss at No. 15 North Carolina State, Massachusetts quarterback Jeff Krohn put the blame for the loss on his own shoulders after missing a handful of open receivers deep downfield.

"We have to play a lot better than that," Krohn said after a 13-for-36, 184-yard, three-interception performance. "I missed about four touchdowns by a step or two. We were about four feet away from being right in this game."

The Arizona State transfer, who came to UMass (2-2, 0-1 Atlantic 10) with a boatload of hype, missed running back Jason Peebler down the sidelines twice, overthrew receiver Adrian Zullo over the top twice, and threw what was a sure touchdown pass to R.J. Cobbs just inches past the running back's outstretched hands. The incompletion to Cobbs ended the first half.

"I overthrew that," Krohn said. "That would have been a momentum swing going into the locker room.

"It's on me. That was all on me."

Head Coach Mark Whipple agreed that Krohn was less than impressive.

"When you miss people wide open down the field, those are big plays and we have to make those," the Brown alum said.

"I told [Krohn], 'you will vomit when you see this tape.' He knows he didn't play well."

Whipple did, however, take some of the blame off his star quarterback.

"Those [defenders] were in his face," Whipple said. "He couldn't see anybody. We started two freshmen on the offensive line."

North Carolina State scored on its first four possessions and never looked back. The Wolfpack picked Krohn off on the Maroon and White's first possession. On third-and-7, Krohn was drilled by State defensive tackle Jerrick Hall as he released the ball, causing it to float into the secondary. Cornerback Marcus Hudson caught the duck, giving the Wolfpack terrific field position for their first offensive possession.

NCSU took just two plays to reach paydirt. Heisman candidate Philip Rivers hit tight end Sean Berton, who found a seam in the UMass zone, for a 23-yard gain. Freshman running back T.A. McLendon went off-tackle right on the second play for 18 yards and the touchdown.

Krohn was picked off again on UMass' second possession when receiver Joe Bruce fell down and State corner Gregory Golden came up with the ball. Twenty-five Massachusetts penalty yards and 20 yards on the ground from McLendon put the Pack on the UMass 12, where Rivers hit Jerricho Cotchery on a fade pattern over defensive back Lamarr Monterio for six more.

Monterio was beaten again on State's next possession. This time, Rivers hit Dovonte Edwards on a fade over Monterio, upping the lead to 21-0. A second-quarter slant from Rivers to receiver Chris Murray gave the Wolfpack an insurmountable lead.

Success and class in the ACC

RALEIGH, N.C. – A parking lot with numbered spaces. Fireworks. A pregame highlight reel that was comparable to any found before an NFL game. Even before the kickoff, it was obvious that the Massachusetts football team was no longer in its safe, protected world of Atlantic 10 football.

Thousands of parking spaces surround the sports complex that houses Carter-Finley Stadium and the Entertainment and Sports Arena, home to North Carolina State's football and basketball teams, respectively. Three hours before the kickoff of Saturday's contest between the Wolfpack and the Minutemen, that lot was more than half-filled with people, all of them with plenty of booze and barbecue, prepping for the day's game. Nearly every car, truck and RV was decked out in bright red, many of them adorned with N.C. State flags flying.

This is Atlantic Coast Conference [ACC] football.

REWARD FOR INFORMATION LEADING TO THE WHEREABOUTS OF ED SOBIAK?
PENNSYLVANIA MAN MISSING SINCE 2001

Few specifics are known about the disappearance of Edward (Ed) Sobian from his house in Brueggertown, PA on September 7, 2001.

But enough has been learned about this computer security specialist to surmise that he was either kidnapped by or fled from the very government sources who had employed him for the last thirteen years.

The BrunoReport has learned that Ed Sobian is an alias – one of many, it is presumed - for Emil Sobiak, formerly a trouble-shooting programmer specializing in government and corporate contract work. Everyone who has known E, as we now refer to him, has an opinion as to how and why he disappeared.

From FBI and NSA government agency e-mails we have obtained, it's possible that E was kidnapped after learning of a secret government computer program capable of hacking into financial systems worldwide.

Former employees of GeneTechWest, a biogenetic research firm headquartered and operating out of San Diego, believe E is on the run because he himself hacked into a mysterious electronic bank vault maintained by an international secret society known only as the Knights of the Web. E allegedly transferred over six hundred thousand dollars from this account to his own.

But for at least one person, true crime writer James Pitt, the search for E is driven by a desire to find a missing friend.

The nature of E's background in arcane electronica makes Internet communication vital in obtaining and disseminating clues about the events leading up to his disappearance. True Crime Press is now subsidizing a collective search, and has sanctioned this call for assistance from the general public to take an active roll in this investigation.

SGA Student Trustee Bill Powers shows disappointment with the low amount of students who voted in last week's election.

SGA elections ratified

Members disappointed with low turnout

By Miriam Godfrey
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

The Student Government Association (SGA) Elections Coordinating Council met yesterday and unanimously ratified the results of the senate races held last week.

About 5.5 percent of students on campus voted. Five percent was needed to make the elections valid.

SGA Coordinating Council Chair Dan Saunders said that he wished more students had turned out on voting day. "I am confident in the senate we have now and hope to fill the vacant seats as soon as possible," he said.

Due to seat vacancies that remain in the senate, the SGA is accepting nomination forms from any interested students that would be ready to commit.

"We're having a rough beginning," senate member Blake Kleppe said. "It's a young senate, but one that's motivated to do a lot of good. One that will ratify and move forward."

Secretary of University Policy Hannah Fatemi agreed. "This senate is enthusiastic and positive. And we're ready to put lots of energy into making great progress this year."

SGA Student Trustee Bill Powers said that he was disappointed with the low voter turnout on the referendum questions. "Hopefully people were aware that the questions were on the back," he said.

The referenda require no voter quota. They were posed on the same ballot as the senate election, giving an equal opportunity to every student to vote. Powers said this number of voters is pretty normal for this type of election. "It's a shame that more people didn't act on these issues while the opportunity was there," he said.

The SGA provides one senator for every 250 students, with a total of 90 seats in the entire senate. Students elect 74 senators out of those 250 seats in area government elections like the one held last week. The Office of African, Latino, Asian, and Native American (ALANA) Affairs caucus and other area government agencies appoint the remainder of the senate members.

Fewer than ten students make up the Coordinating Council that composes the senate during its special period between sessions. The council members met last night in the Student Union to accomplish the tasks on a specific agenda. They hear the results of the student body vote, view a list of the newly appointed senator positions and then vote to ratify and accept the outcome.

With the help of his eight-member committee, Chancellor of the Election Commission Gabriel Tavarez counted the ballots from last Wednesday's vote over the weekend.

To get the five percent of students necessary to make the elections valid, a minimum of 850 students must cast ballots during the voting period. The voting period for last week's elections was originally scheduled for Tuesday and Wednesday, but was later decreased to just one day. The SGA still awaits the final tally from the referendum questions. Only 115 students voted on the referendum ballots.

The questions addressed the selling of beer in the Mullins Center, whether installing video cameras in dormitories would increase campus safety, and whether the school should be investing more money to lobby for state funding.

The first Senate meeting will be held on Wednesday at 7:15 p.m. in the Student Union.

Prowler reported in Mary Lyon

The suspect is described as a light-skinned black male of about 43 years of age. He is 5-foot-9 with a slender build and was wearing a white t-shirt, jeans, and a black jacket at the time of the incident.

The University of Massachusetts experienced its first quiet weekend of police activity after several wild weekends in a row.

One incident that did occur was a breaking and entering in Mary Lyon Dormitory in the Northeast residential area. According to UMass police spokesman Jim Lyons, a woman in the dormitory called in at around 3 p.m. Saturday afternoon to report that a man had just left her room. She said that she left her room to go upstairs for a few minutes and left her door unlocked.

When she returned, the man was in her room. The victim of the breaking and entering reported that the man appeared to be drunk. He allegedly asked her to use her phone, at which point the woman said that her telephone was broken. The man then left her room and walked down the hall. The woman called the police immediately. She also said that the man never touched her.

The man is reported to be a light-skinned black male of about 43 years of age. He is allegedly about 5-foot-9 in height with a slender build. He was wearing a white t-shirt, jeans, and a black jacket at the time of the incident. The UMPD Detectives Department has issued a sketch of the man. The sketch is the fourth one released by University police in the first month of the school year.

Anyone with information regarding this incident is encouraged to contact the UMass Police Department at 545-0893 or call their anonymous TIPS line at 577-8477.

There were no other major incidents over the weekend, with UMPD recording only one arrest. Police arrested Thomas O. Jackson of 55 Court St. in Mansfield, Mass., for disorderly conduct following a disturbance in Coolidge Dormitory.

Engineering Career Fair to be hosted today; Career Services says opportunities available

By S.J. Port
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The University of Massachusetts Campus Career Services office is hosting its annual Engineering Career Fair today in the Campus Center Auditorium from 10 a.m. to 3 p.m.

The fair this year boasts a group of more than thirty employers. According to the Career Services department, companies attending are looking to fill both co-op and full-time positions with engineering and computer science majors.

Tina Acker, the associate director and career fair coordinator, pointed out that the Career Fair "is useful for the prepared individual who knows what he or she is seeking, but also for the person who wants to 'browse' and simply see what kinds of jobs exist for new technology graduates. In spite of the economy's current state, there are still many job opportunities to be had.

All University community members, undergraduates, graduate students and alumni have been welcomed to attend the event by both the cooperating companies and the Career Service Office.

Employers who will be in attendance include Accenture, Alphatech, Analog Devises, BAR Systems-IEWS, CDM, EMC Corporation, General Dynamics: Electric Boat and C4 Systems, General Dynamics: Advanced Information Systems (GDAIS), General Electric, Gillette Company, GZA GeoEnvironmental, Inc., IBM, Invensys/Foxboro, Kollmorgen Electro-Optical, Liberty Mutual, MIT Lincoln Laboratory, MITRE Corporation, Naval Undersea Warfare Center, Parsons, Raytheon Company, Shawmut Design and Construction, SMC Corporation of America, Texas Instruments Incorporated, Travelers, U.S. Department of State, United Parcel Service, United Technologiues, USAF, Verizon, Volpe National Transportation Systems Center, Wold, and Greenfield & Sacks, P.C.

Majors who the career fair will focus on recruiting are all those within the titles of Engineering and Computer Science.

An up-to-date listing of the employers who have registered for the fair is available on the Career Services Web site: http://www-ccn.acad.umass.edu under "Events Calendar."

Second pedestrian hit on University Drive released from hospital

ESTHER DANZIGO/COLLEGIAN

Students move through the crosswalk where Shandralee Lerro of South Boston was struck by an automobile Friday night. Lerro was the second pedestrian hit by an automobile on University Drive last week

Eighteen-year-old Shandralee Lerro of South Boston has been treated and released from Cooley Dickinson Hospital since being struck by a vehicle while crossing a crosswalk on University Drive last Friday night. Lerro was the second victim of a pedestrian accident on the street within a week.

According to University of Massachusetts Police spokesman Jim Lyons, the accident occurred in the crosswalk between the Southwest horseshoe and Purple Lot 22. The vehicle, operated by Larry Feldman, was heading northbound when it struck Lerro around 7:40 p.m. The accident was quickly reported and an ambulance from the Amherst Fire Department was dispatched immediately.

Shortly after, Massachusetts State Police Reconstruction Team also arrived on site. Lerro was transported to Cooley Dickinson Hospital, where she was treated for injury and released.

Last Monday afternoon, freshman Jessica Moody was walking in the crosswalk in front of a stopped car when driver Edward Kaynor drove past the stopped vehicle and hit her. "The thing that concerns us is that we've had two of these so early in the year," Lyons said.

With two accidents already this year, 2002 has been the busiest year for pedestrian accidents since 1999. According to a report published by the UMass Pedestrian Safety Committee, there were eight accidents that resulted in pedestrian injury on campus in 1999. Two of them occurred on University Drive.

Students Courtney Spivack of Jamaica, N.Y., and Lisa Abrams of West Long Branch, N.J., were struck by a vehicle on University Drive in November of 1999. Another student, Allison Lustig of Shrewsbury, Mass., was hit by a motorist on March 3, 1999 while crossing Governors Drive. She eventually died as a result.

Campus officials worked to put a traffic signal in place at the Governors Dr. intersection in 2000. No such plans have been made for University Drive at this time.

600 arrested in protests across nation's capital

By Patrick W. Higgins
U-WIRE (DC Bureau)

(U-WIRE) WASHINGTON - More than 600 activists were arrested in the nation's capital Friday as protesters clashed with police in scattered locations in downtown Washington, D.C.

The arrests came after protesters committed minor acts of disorderly conduct in front of the World Bank and International Monetary Fund headquarters. The demonstrations were the first in a weekend of planned civil disobedience that is expected to draw more than 20,000 people to the District.

The protesters stated plans to shut down the city on Friday by blocking traffic and clogging the Metro subway stations were thwarted by a police force of more than 3,000 on-duty officers from both the District and outside departments.

Police reported minor acts of property damage, but most of the arrests were for misdemeanor charges against those who failed to comply with police orders. An unidentified demonstrator wearing a black bandana across his face launched a smoke bomb and several rocks through the window of Citibank on Vermont and K, marking the most serious act of violence all day.

Twenty-one protesters were arrested for sitting down in the intersection of 14th and Independence Avenue, attempting to stop traffic near the IMF headquarters. Police in riot gear gave them two minutes to move before all 21 were taken into custody, including four people that chained themselves together.

Later in the day, 40 people were arrested after staging a march through the streets that left newspaper stands overturned, tires on fire and debris scattered across the streets. Police surrounded the group, which consisted of more than 500 people, and loaded those who failed to comply with police orders onto Metro buses. They were taken to a cellblock at D.C. Superior Court.

Most of those arrested will face minor charges of failing to obey a police order and disorderly conduct, but are being held in jail cells until Monday morning.

No serious injuries were reported. A 19-year-old protester was struck in face with a police baton, taken to George Washington University Hospital, treated and released with a bloody nose.

Responding to allegations of police brutality, D.C. Police Chief Charles Ramsey said, "There's none of that going on here, we don't really do that sort of thing," continuing on to offer the phone number of the Metro police complaint department to any arrested person who wanted it.

In the Georgetown neighborhood of the city, 300 demonstrators gathered in front of a Gap store to protest against the company's alleged use of sweatshops. They said that they would rather wear nothing than wear Gap clothes and stripped down to their underwear. No arrests were made because protesters had arranged their demonstration with police beforehand.

The World Bank/IMF protests are becoming a semi-annual event for the District, as crowds gather every fall and spring for the organizations planned meetings. The protests are usually peaceful with minimal arrests, but this weekend marked the introduction of a new strategy by the D.C. Metro Police.

Protesters were followed and then quarantined into a small area by a line of police on foot, horseback and bicycle. Those who failed to follow specific police orders or those who attempted to leave the quarantined area were handcuffed, placed on a bus and taken to a police location for processing.

Despite warnings all last week about heavy traffic and a near impossible commute to locations in the District, traffic was lighter than usual, as was public transportation arteries. The easy ride into the city was due in part to most workers' decision to just stay home for the day, heeding previous advice from city officials.

Bringing back respect

It's a fact: the University of Massachusetts-Amherst campus is an unattractive hodgepodge of crumbling cement buildings. More importantly, University student housing, and more specifically Fraternity and Sorority Row are eyesores. Students do nothing to upkeep their dormitories, they smash windows, litter and vandalize in general, yet the sight of their pathetic hallways is nothing in comparison to the repugnant, disgraceful display by the Greek system.

Lawns, if you can call them that without the usual grass involved, is largely plastered with party debris from door to sidewalk. Houses that would otherwise be condemned are covered in chipping paint, tacky signs, Beirut tables lining porches, while parents and donors drive through campus to glimpse the social life of the University students.

The Greek system, long a bastion of school spirit and pride at UMass, is yet another source of aesthetic embarrassment. And, as we all know, the Greek system's appearance is paramount to its ability to draw respect and new members from the community.

At Midwestern schools fraternity and sorority row have edged vibrant green lawns, houses with brick facades, clean porches, neat paint jobs, and enthusiastic supporters in the community who remember their days with their brothers and sisters as a joyous moment in their pasts. They draw in more recruits than they can accept, and pride themselves on looking as good or better than they would want their campus to. As highly visible members of the campus community, houses on frat row should be held to higher standards. They are often the first image, or the last that a parent or friend has entering or leaving UMass.

Greek system housing should follow the lead of Alpha Epsilon Pi (ASP). At the beginning of this fall semester the house took the opportunity to clean itself up. The administration can continue to complain about their noisy, riotous parties but they should praise the house for taking the initiative, time, effort and expense to clean up not only it's front lawn, which now shockingly boasts fresh sod, a sprinkler system to ensure the maintenance of the new grass, but also spread a fresh coat of maroon paint, with clean white trim across its clapboard sides. Their letters, proudly announcing the fraternity's name, have been boldly repainted so that it is visible and obvious to those interested in which fraternity is now respectable, at least in appearance. One can only assume that they have cleaned up the interior of the house as well.

Essentially, the better Frat row looks, and the more cleaned up it becomes, the more willing people, students, parents, community members, and even administrators will be to support the Greek system. The better your house looks the easier it will be to garner respect and recruit new pledges. Those in charge of refurbishing the campus may even begin to listen to complaints from students concerned with its appearance if students take the time to begin the process of beautifying and thus respecting the campus themselves.

ALANA issues not so cut and dry

I'm not a racist. I'd like to get that out and in the open right away to start.

I never have been. I grew up in a relatively poor city with a mixed population that includes many Hispanic people and a growing population of Russians. I grew up about a mile from two large Hispanic projects. It's cool. It's no big deal. Honest. They're good people.

So why am I so defensive about it? It's simple. I've never had anyone challenge my actions in regards to race relations before. I don't act like a bigot. I don't talk like a bigot. My friends that are minorities wouldn't dream of calling me one.

So I guess it irks me now when I read campus news and I hear the argument that anyone not actively involved with the fight to bring back the minority academic support programs is racist.

Plain and simple, that's crap. It's crap because the Office of African, Latino, Asian and Native American (ALANA) Affairs and other groups involved are forgetting a key issue if they argue in that fashion: they're not the only worthy cause on campus. They're not the only ones that got decimated by budget cuts. Nothing could be further from the truth.

The cold, hard facts remain that our campus has no money. We don't have the money to repair buildings. We don't have the money to pay professors the salaries they deserve. We don't have the money to give blue- collar workers on campus the raises they were promised years ago. We don't have the money to keep the tutors we had for learning disabled students. We don't even have the money to offer students the classes they need.

So yes, it follows the horrible trend that we don't have the money to provide minority students on campus with support programs that are tailor-made for their needs.

It sucks. It's wrong. But right now, it's a fact of life.

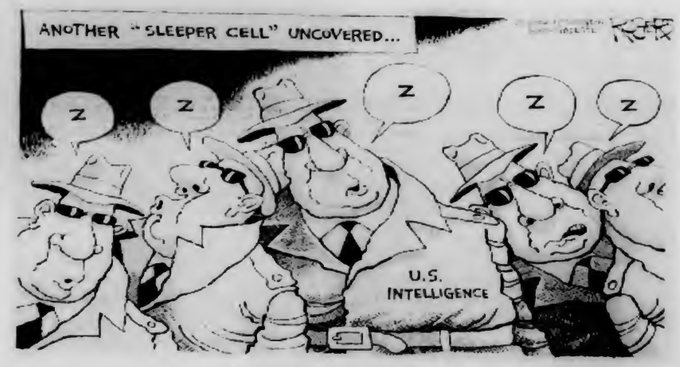
The ALANA groups argue that Ric Townes, the former vice chancellor of campus activities and a large proponent of ALANA students, should be reassigned to a new job. They say that Townes didn't get a fair shake. Honestly, he really didn't. All signs point to Acting Chancellor Marcie Williams taking a parting shot at him on her way out the door. But who's going to pay his salary? Out of whose pocket does it come?

"...We don't have the money to provide minority students on campus with support programs that are tailor-made for their needs. It sucks. It's wrong. But right now, it's a fact of life."

It pisses me off when I see supporters of ALANA students attacking Chancellor Lombardi personally for not reversing decisions that were made before he got here. His strategy to start from scratch with the way campus existed when he arrived in July is the best one he could have made because he doesn't know the details of what went on here firsthand.

Reversing things before he understands the issues only opens him up to more criticism and to making uninformed decisions that would potentially hurt our university. It isn't fair that, regardless of how much attention he pays to this issue, some people are likely to paint him as a racist ogre unless he completely reverses all decisions involved.

The cut of the academic support programs deserves our attention. The student body and the administration need to look for alternative ways to reestablish a program of some kind that both actually has value and gives the students who need it, one-on-one advising that they can trust. It means too much to them.



But the search needs to be reasonable. Our campus has been hit with way more in the past year than any university deserves to bear. A solution that is both affordable and useful won't necessarily be easy to find. Expecting a solution is reasonable. Expecting it in a day is not. We're all missing out on things we used to take for granted at UMass, and we all have different ideas of how the limited pot of money left should be spent.

ALANA groups, if you want support from the general campus population, think wisely about your campaign strategy. There's no doubt that the support programs lost were a vital part in the lives of many students. But don't issue ultimatums. Don't utilize blanket statements along the lines of "you're racist unless..."

You'll lose us all. You'll get tuned out as being a bunch of zealous nuts with tunnel vision and nothing balanced or reasonable to say. I know deep down you're none of those things. Be angry. But be angry constructively. Taking your frustrations out on fellow students beaten down by the same lack of funding that you face isn't fair, productive, or sane.

Find a better way to educate us. It's out there.

Home alone

"There's no place like home," they say, but I've noticed my extended visits home over my past few years at UMass have certainly made me question that verse. My home is South Boston – "Southie", as it's better known, is the home of the "L" Street Tavern, Irish pride and the worst drivers in the nation.

"Good Will Hunting" and the race riots surrounding forced busing in the 1970's gave the town its tough and racist reputation. It is a small, working class inner-city neighborhood with a few schools, few churches, public housing areas and a bar, bank or pizza parlor rotation for each and every corner.

What South Boston is not home to, however, are many college students. Keeping busy when at home or school had always been easy, as I am very lucky to have always had a fairly large circle of friends.

"The group of kids that I went to middle school with, I can go right down the list: in jail, druggie, working, working, jail...."

Going home since I have started college, however, the number just dwindles. My first impression was the reason I didn't get together as much or enjoy it in the same way was that it was because my old friends were simply too busy in their separate lives, moving on and expanding. But it didn't take me long to realize it wasn't that they were moving on, it was that I was, and leaving them what seemed to be light years behind.

Anyone that grows up in inner city neighborhoods I think can agree that, although a great place to grow up, they are the kind of places that if you're not smart and self-assured, it's very easy to fall into several of the city's more frequent problems. Drug addiction, alcohol abuse and teen pregnancy. Sad to say the majority of people I grew up with are the ones I still see when I go home wasting their time hanging on corners till all hours of the night, drinking, doing drugs, or just being an overall drag on society and each other's chances of success.

LINDSEY ELDER

Now, this isn't to say that all college students are mature representatives of our society today by any means, but there certainly becomes a tear between the social classification of those that do go to college and those that don't. It's not that I feel above my peers, just different. I reached maturity, in the sense of common sense, thinking for myself and not worrying what others thought of me, very early in life, unlike most of my former classmates.

I bumped into my friend Chris that I hadn't seen in five years this summer during my few days before coming back to school. I was in line at the local grocery store getting some ham for my grandmother when I recognized him standing beside me. He asked how I was doing, and I told him great. I'm a senior at UMass, I'll be commissioned an Officer this May, and my family is good. The general run down of what I've been up to. When I asked him what he'd been up to, his response was that he'd just gotten out of prison for assault with a deadly weapon on a police officer.

The sad part is this is hardly an isolated incident for my visits home. The group of kids that I went to middle school with, I can go right down the list: in jail, druggie, working, working, jail, look out my window and see her on the corner right now hanging out, pregnant. Southie is a great place, but it can be depressing to know that we all had the same opportunities and to see what different outcomes we've had. In some cases, my classmates who some would argue had even more opportunities – by going to some of the better private schools in and out of the city – are the ones that seem to have progressed the least since we were in school together.

Its strange having your social networks change or be pulled right out from underneath you like mine were. Where you live and who you hang out with inevitably shapes the kind of person you are. If the stereotypical teen is one seen as a punk and you're not, then that makes you someone of strong character but at the same time a social outsider. I've had times when I'd question whether or not to just give in and go hang on the corner for a while and just talk about people or trade funny drunk stories like they do practically every night of the week. Or, I'll rethink that offer to go have a few drinks at "The Point" just to feel like part of the gang at home again. But I'm not like that. I can't say I'm not "anymore" because I never really was in the first place.

As much as I feel like a loser some weekends asking my grandmother what errands she needs done or taking the dog for a long walk as my Saturday night events, being a college student may be the cause for the separation. But it's also the best thing I could have done for myself. And I just want to remind those who don't feel as into the loop and happy at home as they once were; I always keep in mind that it's a good thing that those of my peers that are still home are having all the fun. Because, until they smarten up, they're going to be there for a long, long time.

As I was getting my soup at the Hatch one day this fall, I noticed that my meal plan had double the amount of meals I had paid for. Instead of the 80-meal commuter plan, my account had the 160-economy meal plan. OK. So UMass over charged my parents once again. I knew that they paid the fall bill, a whopping $6750 dollars, because I was the one who actually charged it to their credit card. Now I have double the meals that need. What do I do?

Well, being a college student, money doesn't come too easily, and the difference between meal plans is about $550. So I called the meal plan office and asked them to downgrade my meal plan to the plan I actually wanted.

They were real nice about it and they said I would be getting a refund check in a few weeks. (I did it last year too and have saved the money for Spring Break 2003). Now, with $550 coming to me, I got a little crazy with the credit card. My boyfriend's 21st birthday was coming up, so to surprise him, I booked us a four-day vacation in Las Vegas.

Total price? Just about $550, give or take a few dollars. But what did it matter, this was an awesome birthday present for him and a free vacation for me. I booked the airfare and the three nights at the Paris hotel in Las Vegas, using the money I was saving for Spring break. Refund checks take a few weeks and I didn't want the prices to go up while I waited, so I didn't think twice about spending the money before I had it. Maybe I should have.

I called the Bursars office two weeks later to see how long until I got my refund check. The lady on the phone was real nice, but she didn't know what refund check I was talking about. She had said I had an outstanding balance, and that I actually owed money. Umm, sure. So as soon as my parents pay the commuter account fee, they can issue me the check right? Nope, not even close. UMass had charged me for the biggest meal plan without telling me, and when my parents paid for the bill, there was still a balance of $550 due. So when I downgraded my meal plan to get the refund, I was actually paying off the outstanding balance due. Now, not only I was not getting the money I was depending on, I blew my spring break cash on an extravagant trip to Las Vegas.

If you are a little confused, so am I. How did this get so messed up? For one, the UMass Billing system. It is not up to date on WISE and they are switching over to a new website system, so records are not always accessible. Two, the UMass Bursars office. They send out only a few bills a year and are unclear about what they charge. I asked to wave the childcare and Mass PIRG fee, but I still ended up paying for it. Lastly, stupidity. I should have known UMass would mess this up some how. Nothing runs smoothly here. I learned my lesson: don't trust UMass with money. And before changing anything, check to see if you owe UMass first. I am still going to Las Vegas and I am still going to Cancun for Spring break. I just have to wait for my tax refund check from the government – the one department that may possibly run slower than any one here at UMass.

Sweet Home Alabama
Directed by Andy Tennant
Starring Reese Witherspoon, Patrick Dempsey and Candice Bergen
Playing at Cinemark 12, Hadley

Pulling off a successful romantic comedy is similar to brain surgery: it's necessary to be insanely careful with the knife because a slight slip-up can mess everything up royally. Sweet Home Alabama does this successfully, combining laugh out loud humor, a solid plot and a sweet romance, making it the best romantic comedy since Notting Hill.

Reese Witherspoon stars as Melanie Carmichael, a Manhattan fashion designer originally from Alabama who, early on in the story, becomes engaged to the son of the mayor of New York, Andrew, played by Patrick Dempsey. Little do any of Melanie's New Yorker friends know Melanie is married to a man from her home state of Alabama. In order to marry Andrew, she needs to travel home to have her old husband, played by Josh Lucas, sign the divorce papers and complete the annulment proceedings. Things become complicated when Melanie begins to reconnect with her old buddies from the south and remembers how much she had been in love with Jake before she decided to pack up and move to New York.

Witherspoon shines as Melanie Carmichael, establishing her status as one of Hollywood's new "it" actresses. However, her southern accent is questionable because it strangely fades in and out during different portions of the movie. She is sometimes upstaged by the ice queen New York Mayor that is played by Candice Bergen. Bergen delivers several dry one-liners reminiscent of her "Murphy Brown" days, as Bergen's character is none too fond of Melanie. Ethan Embry plays Bobby Ray, a friend of Melanie's who remains "in the closet" for about half the movie until a drunken Melanie puts on a fabulous show of what not to do when you're intoxicated in an Alabama bar. Andy Tennant's direction is well executed, as he has experience directing cute romantic comedies such as 1997's Fools Rush In, with Matthew Perry and Salma Hayek and 1999's Anna and the King, starring Jodie Foster. The initial proposal scene is one of the most beautifully orchestrated movie shots to ever grace the silver screen. The movie is well written, and the script contains plenty of slapstick southern hick jokes. The greatest line in the entire two-hour movie is delivered by Melanie's father, played by Fred Ward, talking to Bergen's character at the end of the movie when he triumphantly cries out "And the south rises again."

Check this one out if you're going for a sweet romantic comedy. The ending is given away in the trailer, and isn't exactly happy, but reflecting back on what ended up happening, it's what should have taken place. More liberties should have been taken with the script in making one of Melanie's husbands disliked by the audience, as it might have made the ending just a little bit easier to swallow. Witherspoon's performance is wonderful, and Fred Ward's performance as Witherspoon's Civil War reenacting father is absolutely hysterical. Sweet Home Alabama is funny, sweet and amorous fun and is great entertainment without too much effort required by the viewer.

My Big Fat Greek Wedding is out of sync

Joey Fatone takes a breather from his boy band N'SYNC to play a bit part in My Big Fat Greek Wedding

By Johnny Donaldson
COLLEGIAN STAFF

MY BIG FAT GREEK WEDDING
Directed by Joel Zwick
Starring Nia Vardalos and John Corbett
Playing at Cinemark 12 in Hadley

My Big Fat Greek Wedding could be renamed My Big Fat Greek Sitcom and nobody would bat an eye. The movie is a flimsy, slight, disposably charming romantic comedy that never musters anything beyond its self-imposed confines in the world of TV buffoonery. The movie doesn't even have the moxie to be the feature heir to TV's wittiest sitcom creations, nor to plunge as low as the worst the tube has to offer. More often than not, it encircles the world of the forgettable: it plays like a 90-minute version of the kind of show that gets run after "Friends" or "Everybody loves Raymond."

Greek Wedding was adapted from the one-woman show of its writer/star Nia Vardalos, who was given full support by Tom Hanks and his wife, actress Rita Wilson, who took on the job of producers. It's the story of Toula Portokalos (Vardalos), a 30-ish Greek American woman whose current status in life is unacceptable to her old world father Gus (Michael Constantine, talking in theek Vunny Voreign Agzent ,no?) who thinks the blue glass cleaner that is Windex is a miracle cure for every ailment known to man. (Apparently, this is a truthful part of Vardalos' life, but it wasn't funny when Gus sprayed Windex the first time, and repeating the gag didn't help.) Toula is not married (quelle scandale!) and she wants to leave her job as hostess at Dancing Zorba's, the restaurant Gus owns and where half her cousins are employed, to study computers in college.

In Gus' culture, dating a non-Greek is horrible, but marrying one is a sign of the apocalypse. So it's not good when mousy Toula meets handsome, WASP-y non-Greek Ian Miller (John Corbett) and the two fall in love and decide to get married. Toula must convince her family to accept John, who seems more than willing to sacrifice his own beliefs for Toula (he even gets christened into Greek Orthodox for the Portokalos family.)

I am not a Greek. I do not pretend to know about traditional Greek customs. I cannot comment on whether or not My Big Fat Greek Wedding is honest to the customs of the Greek, or if it is a broad stereotyping of the Greeks. What I can say, what I must say, is that My Big Fat Greek Wedding is a dishonest film that expects us to laugh at said customs. (Oh look at the funny Greeks – they think lamb isn't a meat!) Sitting in the audience, I didn't exactly feel comfortable tittering at the wackiness on screen; truthfully, I felt a bit xenophobic, being asked to laugh at a culture that isn't my own. It's a feel-good fake that wants to use ethnicity as fodder for comedy.

Of course, I could just be sounding like a PC crank. But Greek Wedding offers little reward for the audience. It's a stale wedding cake of a movie, treading through the mucky clichés of every other wedding comedy and ethnic comedy that has preceded it. It's not even worth the ink, paper, time and consideration to list the clichés. But I will talk about how the supporting is maltreated: Lainie Kazan plays a brassy ethnic mom role that has been done to death (a lot of the times by Kazan herself), while Gia Carides essays another all too familiar role, the big-haired sexpot in low

Beck strikes powerful inner chord of promise and hope

Beck
Sea Change
Geffen Records

It may take a lot to laugh, but it will take more than a train to produce an album that cries as often and beautifully as this one.

Sea Change, the fifth major label effort from Beck, weeps with fragile optimism in a language more direct and affecting than anything the eclectic musician has attempted before. The soul-searching pays off: more than a Mutations part-two, Sea Change takes one shot of happy, a hundred more of sad, distills the mix into pure melancholy and hides hope somewhere in the brew. The resulting search for that light reveals a single certainty, this is the second classic album Beck has wrestled out of his poet's soul.

It's not a case of past success influencing current opinion: the pain pulsing through the heart of the album is as fresh as the sounds he uses to capture the feelings of life both falling apart and picking itself back up. The intimacy with which he's able to identify detachment is haunting. "There's a bluebird at my window / I can't hear the songs he sings / All the jewels in heaven, they don't look the same to me," he laments on "Guess I'm Doing Fine," a straight-no-chaser confession that will temporarily wipe your mind of every ironic pose Beck has ever struck. He's asked you to the party before: here, backed by sparse guitar, piano and the mood itself, he's simply looking for a shoulder to lean on.

"Put your hands on the wheel / Let the Golden Age begin," he insists on "The Golden Age," the one great song Neil Young never got around to writing. The lyrical directness is illusionary, though: as he forges ahead, we realize that he's just as displaced ("These days I barely get by / I don't even try / It's a treacherous road with a desolated view") as the next lonesome traveler.

The songs here are simple, similar constructions that tackle daunting emotions. They're not all perfect, but then again, few relationships are. After all, what is love? Beck doesn't uncover the answer to that on this set, but understands he's been bitten by it and is doing his damndest to remind us of what the pain both sounds and feels like. On "Lonesome Tears" he finds a way to turn a string section into something more than an aesthetic afterthought, using it as an intricate part of the structure. Heavy verses support the emotional heft of the song, shifting to major and minor keys that merge in epic choruses of tasteful understatement. "Lonesome tears, I can't cry them anymore / I can't think of what they're for / Oh they ruin me every time / But I'll try to leave behind some days, these tears just can't erase / I don't need them anymore." Similarly, on "Round the Bend", he turns his voice inward and lets the imagined atmosphere of synthesizers wash up where his soul once met the fore.

Don't let the mellow moods lull you away, though; his taste for variety, while not as pronounced as the sudden shifts he employed on Odelay and Mutations, is alive and well. Tight, acoustic pieces are more than likely to follow his more ambitious efforts, stripping the grandeur of those with a pointed matter-of-factness. "Paper Tiger" is one of the album's more original in composition, featuring involved guitars that tie together the off-beats of his methodic narration. Here, as on "Tears", the strings punctuate and emphasize, swelling at times in violent bursts and, at others, weave in, out and around the song itself. He winds up a shuffling rhythm section in "End of the Day" and sets it off in search of keyboards and clavinet, the results of which sound like nothing less than a music box literally winding down after a childhood's worth of wear. Album closer "Side of the Road" brings us back to square one, having searched his soul for the better part of 50 minutes. Beck pulls up a stool and spits out as straightforward a country prayer as you'll ever come across. When he asks, "Tell me what I know about the kind of life I never thought I'd live," it surpasses an artist at his/her creative peak; it embodies humanity at its most fragile.

At every turn, Sea Change is a musician's album. There's no time wasted on grandstanding or jockeying for center stage. From the smallest shades colored in by background synth frills right on up to Beck's lead vocals, every piece shares equal space, partly due to Nigel Godrich's (Radiohead) sleight of hand production, which somehow channels rooms full of musicians through the overwhelming persona of one lost soul. Applying polish with a bit of attitude, he tightens in places resident in the acoustic crispness of "All in Your Mind"t and mines in others, pulling from Beck's faux optimistic hopes on "Sunday Sun" ("Yesterdays are mending") the sound of things falling apart, a smart juxtaposition that reminds us, the gentle listeners, that even the smallest allusions can't be sworn as truths.

Why, then, does an album with so much outward gloom strike such a powerful inner chord of promise and hope? Because, at the end of the day, like so many of us, Beck has been there and back and lived to tell the tale. Fractured, but together. Grounded, but growing again. His sad measures are spaced with expectation and the idea that, "I one day he met. Sea Change is his extended hand, knowing it will be held once more, just around the bend.

cleavage with a big-mouthed attitude. Coming off surprisingly well is 'Nsync-er Joey Fatone, in a small but funny role as Toula's mischievous cousin.

Still, there must be a reason why after all these months the skeletal Greek Wedding has become one of the top indies of all time. Well, Vardalos is a charming screen presence. It's good to see that instead of casting a more "conventionally" good-looking actress in the role of Toula, the filmmakers decided to go with Vardalos, who looks the part and knows the part so well that she is convincingly human even when the movie is at its most sitcom-ish. She also has plenty of chemistry with Corbett (whose character is otherwise given short shrift in the interest department), which is the essential key to making the romance work. And some of the movie is really funny, though I wanted to hate myself afterward for laughing at the Greeks. (there's no other way I can put it.) But is it any surprise that CBS ordered up a sitcom spin-off after the success of the movie? Not at all. (IFC Films: Rated PG for sensuality and language.)

Houston, we have a problem:
Embattled diva tries for a comeback

The woman who once sang "I Will Always Love You" may have a tough time having that love reciprocated this fall.

After taking a few years off, Whitney Houston will try for a comeback this season with Just Whitney..., a brand new album. But with the endless damaging stories that have been reported on the once sugary R&B sweetheart, Houston's liftoff may be a turbulent one.

Just Whitney... is the fifth full-length studio album of Houston's 17-year career. Originally scheduled for a Sept. release the album was bumped several times and is now tentatively scheduled for a Nov. 26 release. Other than its floundering first single "Whatchulookinat," not much is known about the album. Her label did say, however, that the CD boasts producers She'kspere (Mariah Carey), Rob Fusari (Destiny's Child), Teddy Bishop (Toni Braxton), Kenneth "Babyface" Edmonds and Missy Elliot. Given that Houston's last all-new release, 1998's well-received My Love Is Your Love, mixed R&B knock-outs with her usual grand ballads, the same can likely be expected on Just Whitney.

But wait, you can't exhale just yet, Houston.

Arista, under the direction of L.A. Reid, is currently paying $100 million plus bonuses to Houston, 39, for six new albums and two hits compilations. With eight consecutive multiplatinum albums, six Grammys, and 11 No. 1 hits, her track record is stellar. But it's been four years since Houston's last studio album, and a 2000 greatest hits disc sold just 2 million copies. Is another Mariah Carey-type debacle on the way?

KAT BOSS/STAFF ARTIST

Whitney's got a lot to justify with Just Whitney.

The singer will have to sell tens of millions of albums in order for Arista (which is no longer run by former mentor Clive Davis) to make their money back. And since she released a greatest hits collection as her last project, Houston will need to start racking up hits faster than you can say "Shoop" (It's not clear whether both compilations need to be strictly greatest hits discs or may include remix compilations, etc.).

Speaking of hits, Houston's widely reported drug abuse has severely tarnished her image. The embattled singer now needs to redirect the focus to her music instead of tabloid stories about erratic behavior and accusations of drug abuse.

But instead as her first single, Houston released the media-bashing "Whatchulookinat," thrusting the negativity right back into the limelight. The lyrics blame the press and everyone else in the world for Houston's constant battles with the tabloids over her alleged drug abuse and husband Bobby Brown's extracurricular activities. And since the single took critics to task, it was in turn taken to task by critics. Radio's response to "Whatchulookinat" was lukewarm at best, and the video shoot was canceled. She'll need a better single to generate the needed buzz and prevent her from singing "I Have Nothing."

Since her last album was released in 1998, cancelled shows, reported drug busts and rumored spousal abuse at the hands of controversial hubby Bobby Brown (who produced "Whatchulookinat") have led a laundry list of problems for the diva. With an aging fan base and a notoriously fickle music audience, Houston we may have a problem.

When she took the stage at the first of Michael Jackson's two self-tribute concerts at Madison Square Garden, her pencil-thin frame had CBS scrambling to alter the footage while some proclaimed that anorexia and drug addiction had left her on death's door.

Even though Arista is comfortably established on the charts with Avril Lavigne, Usher and Pink, Houston is the label's franchise player. The label can't afford an autumn of missed dates and bad press combined with rumors of Houston's troubled life. Which may be one of the reasons's behind the numerous postponements.

Houston has one of the best voices of her generation. The lyrics to "Whatchulookinat" may not be the most ingratiating, but one listen makes it obvious she still has the chops (unless of course there was vocal manipulation involved). Houston would best be advised to kick the track off the album. If the top-flight producers attached to Just Whitney... maintain their standard of excellence, the album could still be a knockout. Houston should work on coming back with style, grace, and talent – the main characteristics that set her apart in the first place.

Once again, Egland had her hands full all game long. She is currently ranked No. 10 in the NCAA in total saves with 70 saves through six games and despite allowing five goals go past her Saturday, she made seven saves.

However, the seven saves were not enough for UMass to pull out its first victory of the season. Connecticut added another two goals in the second half en route to the Huskies' 5-0 victory. It was the fourth time this season that the Maroon and White were shutout.

The Minutewomen were plagued by their lack of execution and the fact that they strayed away from the "simple" according to Shea.

"When we intercept a pass or get a mistake from the other team we don't hammer it down [our opponents'] throats like they do," she said. "When you are under pressure you go to what is familiar to you and a lot of times for us it is our bad habits.

"We are not doing the simple. It is a very simple game. We continue to refuse to do the simple things that will make us a successful team," she added.

The losing streak has reached nine, and it is now apparent that the well-documented, tough out-of-conference schedule has devoured the young, inexperienced UMass squad.

"You have to build on things," Shea said. "There are specific things we need to work on game-by-game and for the next game we need to work on challenging the ball and going to it rather than running away from it."

"[The losing] is starting to get frustrating but when it comes time for conference play we will be fine," Whiston said.

GERALDYN LINCOLN/COLLEGIAN

Sophomore Caitlin Beresin and the Minutewomen were outshot 26-5 against UConn on Saturday, marking the eighth time in nine games that they were outshot this season.

Anaheim Angels vs. New York Yankees

The Bronx Bombers up against the Halos – the mere thought likely evokes laughter in any baseball fan. But on paper these two teams are a lot closer than any Yankee fan wants to know about.

The Angels have been one of the most successful teams against the Yankees this season. With a young rotation and a stacked lineup, Anaheim brings a lot to the table in an opening round series.

The problem is that it is a short series, and while the Angels have a solid rotation, the Yankees are nearly untouchable when it comes to the postseason. And Anaheim would have to win at least one game at Yankee Stadium, something that would be an awful lot to ask of Jarrod Washburn and Kevin Appier. Appier has experience in the playoffs, but is up against playoff stud Andy Pettitte in Game Two. Washburn has to face Clemens, potentially twice, in the Stadium. Asking a win out of him in that situation is a whole lot of pressure for a youngster who has shined despite lots of question marks coming in to the season.

The Angels could steal a couple, but don't expect them to move into the second round. Of course, no one expects them to win, and in situations like that, sometimes a team pulls together to surprise everyone. But not this time.

Prediction: Yankees in five.

Minnesota Twins vs. Oakland Athletics

It's a shame that these two teams have to face off in the first round. The team that almost got eliminated against the team with the Majors' second-lowest payroll. Everyone thinks that the A's are going to walk away with this series. The Twinkies are no doubt are looking to yet again show the world that they don't intend to roll over.

The duo of Torii Hunter and Jacque Jones in the outfield is possibly the best two-man combo of offense and defense in the majors. Guys like Cristian Guzman, Corey Koskie, A.J. Pierzynski and Doug Mientkiewicz have shunted the odds to put together a solid offensive unit that compares to any in the AL. The entire Twins rotation is a bunch of overachievers who, should they be on top of their game, can go head to head with almost any staff in the league, while "Everyday" Eddie Guardado has been money in closing games.

The problem for the Twins is one word in that last sentence – "almost". The A's are the team that has the best starting rotation in the majors. Throw out the month of May and Tim Hudson would be a shoo-in for the Cy Young Award – his ERA would be less than two. Mark Mulder has settled in after a rough start to the season. Barry Zito has been the best non-Red Sox pitcher on the mound this year in the AL and has nerves of steel. And number-four starter Cory Lidle only ran off about 30 scoreless innings in a row.

The offense for the A's has been spotty, but in the clutch no one has been better this year than Miguel Tejada. Eric Chavez is still a force as a cleanup hitter, and the addition of Ray Durham gives the A's speed, power and on-base percentage at the top of the lineup. Terrence Long and David Justice are solid hitters, and Scott Hatteberg and John Mabry have put together the best seasons of their careers. As long as everyone remembers to slide, the A's will advance to the second round. If I didn't love the A's, I would take them in five, but since I do love them, I'll make it a little easier for them.

The League Championship Series will both be two hard-fought affairs where the team that is left standing will have to go on pure grit into the World Series.

NLCS: Cardinals over Giants in six.
ALCS: A's over Yankees in seven.
World Series: A's over Cardinals in six.

"It was a new experience for a lot of the younger guys," said Ahearn. "We were competing with some of the top programs in the country in a race larger than we're used to, but it is something we hope we can build off of."

In the women's cross country division, Missouri placed first, followed by Wake Forest and Saint Adams. The Minutewomen were led by Alexis Anzelone, who finished the 5-K race in 88th place with a time of 23:53. She was followed by Julie McGee, who came in 146th place with a time of 24:30. Katie Knowles, competing in her first meet of the year, was 172nd with a time of 25:02. She said her teammates are gaining the experience needed to be a factor as the season progresses.

"We didn't do all that well [in the Meet of Champions], but through our tough practices during the week and hard work in our meets, we're getting stronger," she said. "With each meet we gain a little more confidence."

Other individual times were Emma Horton (174th, 25:08), Sherri Korlacki (185th, 25:25), Loren Donohue (197th, 25:51), Amanda Dahlberg (202nd, 25:58), Denise Dipaolo (211th, 26:19), Katelyn Mackenzie (217th, 26:29), and Joanne Fredette (234th, 27:32).

"We're really working well together now," said McGee. "And with the Atlantic 10's coming up, we think we can surprise a lot of people."

Both the women's and men's cross country teams will return to action on Friday, Oct. 11, when they compete in the New England Championships at Boston's Franklin Park.

MLB postseason one for the ages

Most of the nation has been enthralled by the football season so far, and baseball has taken a backseat to the NFL world. But with the postseason kicking off today, it's time once again to embrace the grand old game of baseball. And with that, of course, come the predictions. Will the Yankees do it again? Can anyone stop Arizona's one-two punch? Will Barry finally cash in on his title? And can the high-flying A's stop MLB's version of the 'Little Engine That Could' in the form of the Minnesota Twins?

MATT BRADY

Arizona Diamondbacks vs. St. Louis Cardinals

In a year of incredibly interesting series, this is one that could wind up taking a back seat. That would be such a shame. The Diamondbacks have everything to lose, having won one of the greatest World Series of our lifetime over the seemingly unbeatable Yankees. The Cardinals have nothing to lose, as everyone wrote them off around midseason, when they lost something far more precious than winning, with the sudden death of team leader Darryl Kile and the loss of broadcasting icon Jack Buck in the span of a week.

True, the Cardinals did play in one of the weakest divisions in the NL Central, but they still won 97 games on the season. The D-Backs came flying out of the gates and managed to hold on to win the toughest division in the NL. The pitching matchup obviously favors Arizona with Randy Johnson and Curt Schilling forming the most talented and most well-polished one-two combo in the last 25 years. Offensively the two teams are very even, but the losses of Luis Gonzalez and Craig Counsell put the Cards well ahead. On defense, the Cards have the best infield the majors has seen in years, and with Jim Edmunds and J.D. Drew in center and right, the outfield is incredible as well.

Here's the question: Can Matt Morris and Chuck Finley combine to take at least one from Johnson and Schilling? With one of the best 12-to-six curveballs in the majors, Morris is a bona fide ace and Finley is a wily veteran. Not to mention the fact that Woody Williams is a solid number three. Morris will take at least one, and Finley has a good shot at putting one in the books as well. The added emotional advantage should be enough to boost the Cards into the second round.

Prediction: Cardinals in five

Atlanta Braves vs. San Francisco Giants

Long-time bridesmaid Atlanta is back in the postseason as it has been every year since I lost my first tooth, it seems. The Braves waltzed through the NL East this year and have been on cruise control since the beginning of September, if not before. The Giants were fighting hard just to get in to the playoffs until last week. This could benefit the Giants, but the Braves are far too experienced to get lackadaisical going into the playoffs.

Everyone knows that Atlanta's rotation is one of the best in the league, but everyone overlooks San Fran's. Jason Schmidt has developed into a solid number one starter, Russ Ortiz – when he's on – is a fantastic second, Kirk "Dopey" Rueter has one of the highest active winning percentages and Livan Hernandez, despite all the hype about him losing 16 games for a playoff team, will certainly eat up innings in the four slot and keep the Giants in any ball game. Of course, Atlanta still has Greg Maddux and Tom Glavine, who could easily win three games on their own.

Offensively, the Giants have a quality lineup that features two guys who can provide power and timely hitting when needed in Rich Aurilia and Jeff Kent. They also have a slew of guys who come through often in the clutch like J.T. Snow, Benito Santiago and Reggie Sanders. If hot, those three could spark the offense enough to push the lints past the Braves. Oh yeah, and Barry Bonds is one of the greatest offensive forces ever.

The Braves have been spotty on offense, but Gary Sheffield has proved a worthwhile addition and has not been a headache at all. The two Joneses, Chipper and Andruw, are guys who can bust a game open at any time, though Chipper a little more consistently than Andruw. Javy Lopez could knock a few balls around, but after that (and speed demon Rafael Furcal) there are slim pickings.

This series will come down to whether the Braves' experience will top the talent of the Giants. The Braves have been sliding as of late, but come playoff time, that all gets thrown out the window. If Schmidt and Ortiz can duel with the big guns, the Giants will likely pull this one out.

Prediction: Giants in five.

Nine lives down

Loss to UConn extends streak

By Glen Straub
COLLEGIAN STAFF

At the conclusion of every contest, the Massachusetts field hockey team (0-9, 0-0 A-10) gathers at the far corner of the field, distant from any sort of distraction of parents and fans. Usually the team members take a short time to discuss their feelings on the game they just played. Of course, Head Coach Patty Shea leads the discussion, pointing out her observations of the Minutewomen's play.

After a 5-0 loss at the hands of bitter rival Connecticut (5-5) on Saturday at Richard F. Garber Field – extending the season-opening losing streak to nine – Coach Shea kept the ladies in the meeting for twenty minutes, a far greater amount of time than any other meeting this season. It had finally gotten to her. The losing has become disheartening for Shea.

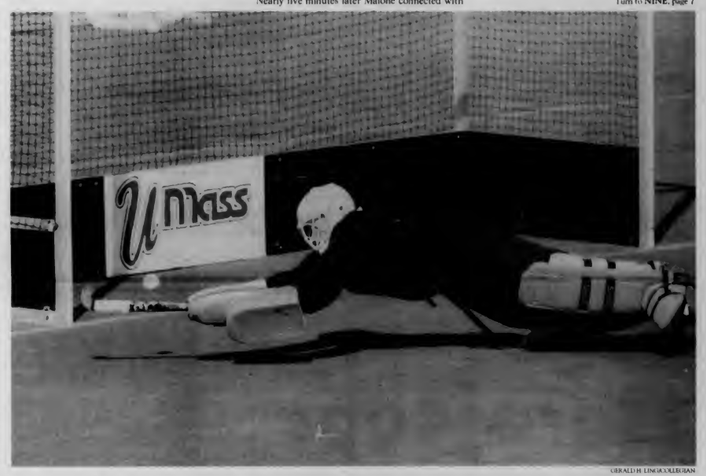
"We put ourselves behind the eight ball every time," she said. "It is hard to try to keep digging up in these games. Now it's a matter of getting them to actually process what we need to do."

The hole for the Maroon and White was dug early in the affair as the Huskies tallied three goals in the first half.

Five minutes into the game, UConn got on the board when forward Mary Jo Malone split the UMass defense and fired a shot past Massachusetts goaltender Ashley Egland.

Nearly five minutes later Malone connected with the back of the cage again, receiving a cross pass from forward Lauren Henderson and firing a shot from the right side of the zone past Egland one more time.

Just ten minutes into the game, the Huskies had a commanding 2-0 edge on the Minutewomen.



"Connecticut capitalized on our very blatant mistakes and we paid for it," Shea said.

In the first half, the Huskies dominated play, as UMass was outshot 15-1 and lost the penalty corners category 6-0 to UConn resulting in a 3-0 Husky lead at the break.

In the second half the trend continued and after the final buzzer went off, UMass had been oushot 26-5 – another disastrous offense output.

"We need to shoot early and often," co-captain Erika Whiston said. "Even if we are far out of the zone we should shoot because maybe a deflection or

This Saturday, the Massachusetts men's and women's cross country teams traveled to Van Cortlandt Park in the Bronx, N.Y. to compete in the 2002 Brother Paddy Doyle Meet of Champions. Hoping to further their improvement, both teams returned to campus disappointed as the men's team placed 21st out of 26 teams and the women's team placed 20th out of 25.

On the men's side, national powers led the way as Iona, ranked 16th in Division I, placed first, followed by 21st ranked Dartmouth and Brown in 3rd. For the Massachusetts men's team, Ed Breen led the way with a 110th-place finish. Breen, who finished the 5-K course in 26:55, said that despite the official results, the race was a step in the right direction for himself and his inexperienced teammates in their quest for improvement.

"We feel we did ok, we had a solid week of training and for the most part, the guys stuck to their race strategy," he said. "We didn't finish as well as we would've liked, but the guys worked together and made good adjustments. We definitely feel we can build off of it."

Breen was followed by Mike Ahearn in 131st place with a time of 27:20, and Andy McCarron finished in 152nd place with a time of 27:37. Other individual times and placements included Paul Noone (174th, 27:58), John Jacobson (175th, 27:58), Sean Corbett (178th, 28:00), Colin Baughman (184th, 28:07), Josh Williams (186th, 28:08), Rich Harris (196th, 28:14), Ryan Bourque (208th, 28:36), Matt Clark at (212th, 28:43), Dave McMenemy (222nd, 29:05) and Jeff Way at (223rd, 29:11). In what would seem to have served as a baptism by fire for the men, it will hopefully be a building block for future success.

Rain, rain go away...

Michelle Luttati and the Massachusetts women's soccer team were left soaking wet after Friday's game against Syracuse University was postponed at halftime. A torrential downpour in the Syracuse area forced officials to stop play when field conditions became hazardous. It is not yet known if the Maroon and White will reschedule the match with the Orangewomen. The Minutewomen next take to the field this weekend in Ohio with games against Atlantic 10 foes Xavier and Dayton. Read about the matchups in Friday's Collegian.

Golden Key Society receives honors

COURTESY GOLDEN KEY INTERNATIONAL HONOR SOCIETY

Representatives of the Golden Key International Honor Society accept one of the various awards it has recieved this year. The organization allows members to develop their leadership skills and give back to the community.

By Christina E. Sanchez
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

The wall of awards in Gladys Rodriguez's office is a little bit fuller now.

The University of Massachusetts chapter of the Golden Key International Honor Society received four awards in August in recognition of the group's teamwork, leadership and chapter activities.

Members of the UMass chapter were presented the Key Chapter Award, an honor bestowed upon only 15 of over 300 chapters, at the August 2002 Convention. The convention, titled "Rewarding Excellence," was held in Atlanta, the birthplace of the society, to celebrate its 25th anniversary.

At the 2002 Northeast Regional Conference, the UMass chapter won three awards. Gladys Rodriguez, the chapter advisor and the associate dean of students, was honored for a second time as Northeastern Advisor of the year for 2001-2002. Rodriguez has been the chapter advisor for 11 years and first received Northeastern Advisor of the year for 1993-1994.

Rodriguez says she is very active with the students in the UMass chapter.

"I love to deal with students. I participate in every activity and come to every meeting," Rodriguez said. "If they're up on a stage singing songs, I'll be up there with them kicking my heels."

The two other awards won by the chapter are the Golden Key 2002 Northeast Conference Honorary Member Activity and the Golden Key 2002 Northeast Conference Outstanding Newsletter.

"It's a group I am very proud of," Rodriguez said. "This is an organization where the students make it work. Often, I will sit back and listen to their discussions, and if I feel they are way out there, I will chime in to offer my opinion."

The organization allows members to develop their leadership skills, give back to the community, receive recognition for their academic achievements, and win scholarships.

"We are so involved," Kathryn J. Wilson, senior Biology major and chapter treasurer said. "The society makes you want to get more involved and to do more for the community."

"I wanted to join an honor society. Besides having it on my resume, I want to know that I got involved," she added.

The Golden Key Chapter does a number of community service activities. It also encourages non-member participation and collaboration with other groups.

"We want volunteers even if they are not Golden Key members," Rodriguez said. "We would like other groups to collaborate with us. You can do more when more people are involved."

Jorge L. Oliver, a senior History major and historian for the chapter, said it is important to help different communities.

"It makes you realize that a small piece like this makes a big difference," he said.

Other activities and projects the chapter has done include visiting the elderly at the Northampton nursing home, volunteering at The Food Bank,

SGA looks for more student involvement following elections

By Kristin Shrewsbury
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Student Government Association Senate will convene tonight for their first Senate meeting of the year.

Having just made the mandatory five percent student vote, SGA members are satisfied.

"We've already had students come to the office and take out papers," Speaker Dan Saunders said. "I was disappointed with the voter turnout of the elections, but it was partly our fault considering we could have done better advertising."

Issues revolving around campus safety will be the Senate's top priority as they are forming a Select Committee on Public Safety. With only 49 out of the 72 seats filled and just one tie, the SGA is looking to fill those seats.

Conflicts in organizing a successful and timely election began with an advertisement placed in the Collegian 16 hours prior to the elections, instead of 24 hours before the elections, causing it to be published too late to fulfill its purpose. The election was further complicated by the delayed counting of the ballots. According to Saunders, the ballots could not be counted due to the misplacement of the master keys by previous Elections Chancellor Vincent Neval. Saunders explained that officials, realizing the keys would not be located, finally cut the boxes open.

"We lost the keys to the ballot boxes which were misplaced or lost by last years Chancellor of Elections, and we had to get the locks cut off on Friday," Saunders said. "[Chancellor of Elections] Gabe [Tavares] went to count them on Thursday, but couldn't so we had to wait until the weekend."

Following the counting of the ballots, the SGA began work on its regular agenda. Members will be discussing Senate committees as well as the general rules of the Senate at tonight's meeting.

"This year were going to take time to talk to the new Senate and we're also going to be discussing committees and forming them so they can be up and running in the next two to three meetings," Saunders said.

The Executive Cabinet will also be attending the meeting to talk to the new Senate about their role. Saunders explained that the Executive Cabinet is looking to play a large role within the Senate, and the Senate will also be working closely with the Executive Cabinet.

"Members of the Executive Cabinet will be explaining what they are doing this year, and what they hope to accomplish this year with the Senate," Saunders said. "Everyone wants to work to build stronger relationships between both areas of the SGA."

One new committee that has been listed the top priority of the SGA is a Select Committee on Public Safety.

"The forming of the Select Committee on Public Safety is my top priority," Associate Speaker Matt Pelnar said. "As well as making sure all the paperwork gets to where it's supposed to [be], because last year things didn't always make it to where they were supposed to."

Members of the Executive Cabinet will in addition be working with the Select committee throughout the year. SGA President David Carr as well as Secretary of University Policy Hannah Fatemi stressed their commitment to issues surrounding public safety on campus.

Members of the SGA are looking to garner new student perspectives, are hopeful that they will be able to bring forth issues that students want to deal with at the University.

Saunders explained that due to last year's progress, this is the time to tackle issues and set the stage for the next eight to ten years of the Senate.

"People joined the Senate because they want to make changes," Saunders said. "Last year Aaron (former Senate Speaker) did everything and really held peoples hands, and I don't think we're going to have to do that this year."

Saunders said that he hopes that students will realize the effects that the Senate has on the student body, and the power they hold to make changes.

"We have a prime responsibility on this campus and I think people just view us as another Registered Student Organization," Saunders said. "We have the power to make real changes and we're going to be having longer meetings this year, making motions with more meat to them and getting things done. We have the need, now we just need the how from the Senate and students."

The SGA Senate meeting is being held tonight in the Campus Center in room 174 at 7:15 p.m. All Senate meetings are open to the public.

Domestic Violence Awareness Month begins at UMass

By Amy O'Neill
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Everywoman's Center commenced Domestic Violence Awareness Month yesterday on the University of Massachusetts' Campus Center steps with its "Hands Are Not for Hurting" campaign. The slogan will be advertised throughout the month in an effort to raise campus awareness and stop domestic violence.

Students, faculty and community service organizations met yesterday at 12 p.m. to show their support for victims of domestic violence by putting their hands in paint and placing them on a 12 ft. canvas banner, reinforcing the "Hands Are Not for Hurting" slogan. Participants were also asked to sign a pledge vowing that they will not hurt or be aggressive towards others.

According to the Everywoman's Center, domestic violence is an epidemic. Every day, at least three women are murdered by their husbands or boyfriends, and approximately 1.5 million women and 835,000 men are raped and/or physically assaulted by an intimate partner annually in the United States. In addition, one in four gay, lesbian, bisexual and transgendered (GLBT) people are battered by a partner. The Everywoman's Center's goal for this event, and this month, is to work towards building a community that has zero tolerance for violence and abuse.

"We just wanted people to come out and participate and make that personal commitment," said Ben Ostiguy, who works for the Everywoman's Center and helped arrange this event. "There were quite a few people who sat down and listened to the event and at least 50 people made handprints."

La Warna Lett-Brewington, director of community education at Everywoman's Center, who emceed the event, read the names of Western Mass. victims within the last 10 years. Other speakers included: Domestic Violence Activist Yoko Kato; UMass Athletics Director Ian McCaw; UMass Professor Steve Jefferson, who is the Group Facilitator with the Men Overcoming Violence Program of the Men's Resource Center of Western Massachusetts; UMass Chief of Police Barbara O'Connor; Sonny Suchdev, Community Development and Programs Coordinator Graduate Assistant in the Office of Alana Affairs at UMass; Director of the UMass Women's Studies Department Arlene Avakian; and Steve Trudel, Intake Coordinator for Men Overcoming Violence (MOVE), which is operated through the Men's Resource Center of Western Massachusetts.

Other events being put on by the Center in relation to Domestic Violence Awareness Month will be taking place throughout the month including a theatre performance by Reanae McNeal, who Ostiguy claims is "outstanding." McNeal will also be hosting a workshop called, "The Art of Storytelling," which will teach interested people how to incorporate the arts into social justice, counseling, educational, human rights and civil rights work. For additional events, contact the Everywoman's Center at 545-0833.

Ostiguy encourages other interested students to stop by the Campus Center on Tuesday through Thursday throughout October to add to the "Hands Are Not for Hurting" banner by placing their handprint on it. Students can also become involved in other ways by contacting the Everywoman's Center at 545-2586. Students that need to speak with a crisis counselor can call the hotline at 545-0800.

collecting clothing and food to donate to the Amherst Survival Center, tutoring, bringing cats and dogs to visit the elderly and many others.

When the chapter did "Warm Up America," the group collaborated with the Grayson Field House Council. Members of the two groups knitted quilts and sent them to the American Red Cross. The quilts were distributed to people in need.

The chapter also provides tutoring to elementary students, in association with the Wildwood Elementary School, located at 71 Strong St. in Amherst. Rodriguez said the program welcomes anyone who is interested in tutoring. Tutoring responsibilities consist of helping students with homework, school projects, math practice and helping to create organizational and studying skills.

Besides helping students to improve in academics, Wilson said the chapter also works to give to make people feel good through activities such as the ornament-making project.

Every year, a giving tree is created at Baystate Medical Center for the Pediatric/Perinatal/Adolescent Children's Communicable Diseases HIV/AIDS program. The tree is filled with homemade ornaments. Every ornament made and placed on the tree will be matched with an equal number of gifts. For example, if 100 ornaments are made, then 100 gifts will be donated by Baystate Medical to give to children in the program.

In order to fill the tree, the chapter gathers a group of children from North Village Apartments in Amherst who volunteer to make ornaments.

Wilson said that the project is very rewarding.

"You should see the children's faces because they know they are doing something good," she said.

Rodriguez said that activities such as these are good for the relationship between students and the community.

"The community gets to see a different side of the student body. They see students that excel and want to do well," Rodriguez said.

The Golden Key International Honor Society was formed in 1977 by a group of business students at Georgia State University because there was no general honor society; many of the professional schools were left out. It is unlike many other honor societies due to the fact that it is not restricted to one specific area of study. Many other societies are restricted primarily to liberal arts students.

Students who become members of the Society are juniors or seniors who are in the top 15 percent of their class with a GPA of 3.6 or above.

The road doesn't end here for the chapter. The chapter's members said they are striving and working together to win the President's award, which is the most prestigious honor that a chapter can receive. The President's award is the next step up from the Key Chapter Award.

I get so frustrated when I'm preached at – does anyone ever listen?

Or when someone tells me, "Well, the Bible says so" – but they have no idea why... That just drives me NUTS!!

The Dialogue on Faith and Reason

(2) UMass faculty and (1) grad student host an open hour of discussion, addressing topics like:

Are faith and reason contradictory?

How much can we know about religious claims anyway?

Has anyone messed with the Bible since it was originally written?

If God is loving & just, why does He permit evil?

If some say Jesus is "the only way," what about people in other religions?

In a university devoted to inquiry, is it a good idea to exclude spiritual views from the classroom?

Is "religious truth" different from "scientific truth"?

Thursday, October 3rd, Noon – 1pm, Campus Center 163
Bring your lunch – all UMass community members invited.

Womanshelter of Holyoke hosting third annual march and rally

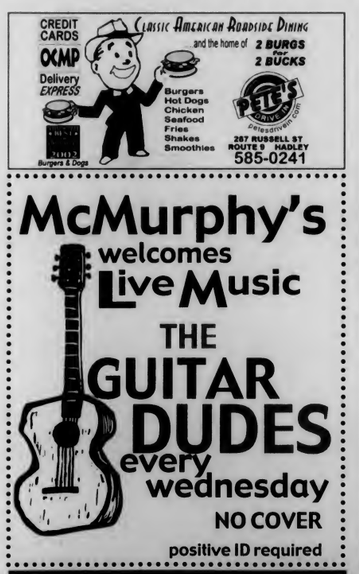
The Womanshelter/Compañeras of Holyoke is hosting the third annual citywide march and rally against domestic violence today beginning at 5:00 p.m. at the War Memorial on Appleton and Maple Streets in Holyoke. The event is in recognition of Domestic Violence Awareness Month.

"Remember the Victims, Celebrate the Survivors, Support Those Affected by Domestic Violence" is the theme of the march, which will end at the Heritage Park. Once at the park, participants can view the Silent Witness exhibit in remembrance of the 14 victims of domestic violence murders in Massachusetts this year.

Upon the conclusion of the march there will be rally featuring a performance by local vocalist Yelsie Mateo and guitarist Anthony Diaz. The performances will present a song written by Mateo about the experiences of a survivor.

This will be the first year that the Womanshelter will be inviting men to sign up for the new Men's Initiative to End Violence program, an agenda which is designed to encourage men to become involved in stopping domestic violence, according to Sarah Huntington, the center's Teen Specialist.

The Men's Initiative to End Violence is a program used at other shelters throughout Massachusetts and according to Huntington, they have already had some replies from men in Western Mass. who are interested in participating. The shelter was given a grant from the Haymarket People's Fund for Men's Initiative for the fall of 2002. The find has provided the Womanshelter with the funds to start the Men's Initiative mission.



One of the projects that the Men's Initiative participates in is holding discussions with males in the community and asking them to sign a pledge promising that they will not abuse women. The Men's Initiative project will also have a Mother's Day project in which men of all ages sign the pledge saying that they will not abuse women and then send their contract to their mothers.

"Our hope is that men will take this project over with the help of the shelter," Huntington said. "The shelters in Boston are seeing success and have done some really great projects."

More than 200 people turned out for the event last year and the same attendance is expected this year as well. The rally gives the members of the community and surrounding areas the opportunity to learn more about domestic violence resources while showing support for victims and survivors.

Anyone interested in becoming more involved with the shelter or the Men's Initiative, or who are unable to attend today's event should contact the Womanshelter/Compañeras office at 538-9717.

The war on Iraq:
The hard sell

"I lay ladies of old. You lie and deceive
A world war can be won. You want me to believe.
But I see through your eyes, And I see through your brain
Like I see through the water, That runs down my drain."

In his 1963 anti-war song "Masters of War," Bob Dylan sings out against the war industry and elected officials trying to "sell" the war.

We are seeing this scenario played out again, and again we are struggling to speak out against it.

Whether there is a majority approval for the pending "war on Iraq" is hard to judge. Polls ask loaded questions for opinions about whether people support an attack on Saddam Hussein or if it coincides with our existing "War on Terror."

Other questions ask whether people are for or against protecting the United States, or the United States' interests abroad.

These questions circumvent the underlying question most people would like to answer. No one is being asked whether or not they support an attack on Iraq as a new war. Instead they are being asked questions that cry for honest answers, many of those being "yes."

It seems obvious that elected officials have not gained the support they need or want before going ahead with preemptive strikes. If they had, why would they still be campaigning and convincing and selling the war?

Secret meetings take place about secret documents. Legislative leaders, Cabinet secretaries, all of them are making their own arguments. Whether it is Gephardt, Lott, or Daschle, as Senate leaders, or Powell, Rumsfeld, Ashcroft, Cheney, or Bush, as executives, arguments being made are thrown back and forth across the nightly news.

But no resolutions are being made. There are all these calls for a bipartisan agreement, for a proposal to go to the United Nations.

Maybe this will happen, maybe there will be an agreement. Will the U.N. agree though?

Right after U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan spoke out about taking cautious steps and going ahead with weapon inspectors, President Bush tried to convince the representatives that preemptive strikes were the way to go.

We need to know where everyone stands. We need to get an opinion from every leader, from every voter. Speak out to the ones you voted for, and make them responsible for who they represent.

"Come you masters of war, You that build all the guns
You that build the death planes, You that build the big bombs
You that hide behind walls, You that hide behind desks
I just want you to know, I can see through your masks."

Nothing for something: the great bottled water scam

FRANCES CARR

Imagine yourself in a non-descript convenience store. You just pulled into this Mobil-Mart or A-Plus because you are parched and are craving a water to quench your thirst. You approach the clear glass refrigerator that holds those sleek water bottles, lined up ever so carefully and strategically. You are looking for an Aquafina, your favorite water. There is something so refreshing and cool about the fancy blue design on the bottle. "If I can just find myself an Aquafina to drink, I can be refreshed and cool and fancy too," you think to yourself. Who cares if it isn't actually spring water?

The marketing geniuses that masterminded the graphics make it seem as though it is something more than simply tap water. And what a name, what a fitting Latin translation: fine water or end water, the water to end all waters?

Unless you've ever questioned the source based upon the graphics that allude to something else, you just assume that this water came from a crystal clear spring somewhere high atop a snow-capped mountain. Images can be misleading. Sorry to burst your bubble, but a lot of the time there is no mountain, no flowing spring. The source in Dasani's case, is a Coca-Cola plant. If you consider this corporate summit a mountain, then climb on.

One quarter of all bottled water comes simply from the tap. So how do these companies get away with splashing a little bit of processed municipal water, that they access for free, into pretty little bottles and selling it to thirsty consumers for a gross yearly profit of $4 billion? Reverse osmosis, the process by which water is filtered to remove any significant levels of anything that could be bad for you and also to remove whatever taste may be present. But here's a newsflash: free water goes through much more testing for contaminants than any bottled water, including spring water.

You should drink a lot of water. According to my doctor, about a gallon a day, minimum. But, we aren't all rolling in dough and those $2 bottles add up. Imagine that you drink a bottle a day, well under your recommended allowance, for argument's sake. After a year, you will have spent a completely unnecessary $730 for something that is automatically dilivered to your house for a few cents. Save some money, buy a Brita filter; it does the same thing.

And, by the way, if tap water is too dirty to drink, it is way too dirty to clean ourselves with, it'll once read that Demi Moore bathes in spring water) or for that matter wash our dishes or laundry with it. Where will it end?

In a new series of commercials, Aquafina at least has the decency to be straight with consumers when it comes right out and says, "We promise nothing." Or for its spin on fruit water, "nothing and more." It is telling us the contents of the cute little bottle are worthless, and we are rushing out and scooping it up. I'll bet the members of the bottled water industry are having a hearty laugh at our expense, not to mention getting a big heap of money.

"And what a name, what a fitting Latin translation..."

At the rate the bottled water industry is growing and the demand for the neatly packaged tap water is increasing, will the same phenomena rise up between Dasani and Aquafina as it has between their respective parent companies, Coke and Pepsi? Will the future hold water taste tests, or to-the-death loyalty to one company or the other? Or, will people finally see the stupidity in throwing their hard earned money into 12 ounces of nothing? Careful consumers bear in mind that while, yes, it is healthier than its sugary convenience store counterparts, water is also free and there's an infinite amount at home.

REGAN MCKENDRY

October 1 is in the history books for numerous reasons. Walter Matthau, Jimmy Carter, Julie Andrews, and Mark McGwire all entered the world. On Oct. 1, 1851 the first Hawaiian stamps were issued. Yellowstone was officially established in 1890. As this is hurricane season, I should probably let you know that the third deadliest hurricane in American history, which killed roughly 1,800 people in Mississippi, occurred in 1893. Henry Ford [illegible] the Model T (1908), television premiered "The [illegible]-nomers" (1955), and Johnny Carson hosted his [illegible] episode of "The Tonight Show" (1962). Florida [illegible] Walt Disney's Magic Kingdom (1971) and Epcot [illegible] (1982). And though Red Sox fans can take solace [illegible] was on Oct. 1, 1912 that the Yankees lost their [illegible] game en route to a 50-102 season, it was also on [illegible] that Babe Ruth hit his famous "called shot" [illegible] in 1932) and Roger Maris set a new homerun [illegible] in a season.

Another notable event transpired in the small hamlet [illegible] almost yesterday. In the windowless dungeon of the [illegible] Center basement, a group of friends was faced [illegible] the ultimate challenge: what would they do without [illegible] Internet?

As I'm sure most of those on campus know, the network for the university went down campus-wide yesterday around the morning and early afternoon. This did [illegible] a problem to me until around 1 p.m. Before [illegible] sitting in class where my ability to browse the [illegible] carried zero significance whatsoever. After lunch [illegible] I came down to the Collegian to get to work and, [illegible] behold, I found myself cut off from the rest of the [illegible] world.

There was a group of us down here, each going [illegible] different levels of withdrawal. Some people [illegible] it at most as a minor inconvenience, but there [illegible] those who seemed like they were ready to erupt [illegible] comics similar to a heroin addict who needed a [illegible] fix. With no Internet capabilities, there were no websites [illegible] to research, no email to check, no people to converse [illegible] on IM.

It was an amazing revelation that researchers were unfortunately not here to witness. Slowly but surely, people were remembering what it was like to communicate and interact without the aid of a single electronic device. Skills that many scientists, I'm sure, have long since considered dormant since the invention of the all-powerful Internet, suddenly sprung to life with new resilience.

Regretfully, the joy was short-lived. For around half past two, it was discovered that indeed UMass was back online. Like Pavlov's dog responding to the dinner bell, any current conversations were halted as people made their way to their respective computers. The sounds of Instant Messages being sent back and forth replaced that of actual oral conversation, and the normal order of existence was once again restored.

As college students, we were old enough to call on our ancient skills of interpersonal reaction, that we had learned when we were toddlers. I wondered though, what would have become of today's kids, the first and second graders who have had access to the web their whole lives. If that was taken away from them in an instant. I think many might feel lost, alone, and scared. How would they communicate with friends if Instant Messenger wouldn't connect? How could they see what was going on in the world without checking a website? Sure the answers seem obvious to you and I, but what about your average seven-year old?

There's an old episode of "The Simpsons" from the second season Marge, outraged by the gross amounts of violence in cartoons, gets the shows to become more about sharing and caring. Since the new shows don't appeal to children, the town's kids turn off their TVs and rediscover what it was like to be a child before the boob tube. The youngsters go fishing, bird watching, and enjoy a game of sandlot baseball. In the end, bliss is lost as the cartoons return to their original content, and the kids return to their spots on the living room couch.

Now please don't feel I'm advocating that everyone unplug their modems and Ethernet cables, nor am I demanding that we all unplug our televisions. (In fact I personally am the biggest opponent around of "Turn off your TV Week.") The Internet is an incredibly useful technology that has revolutionized the world for the better. Instant Messenger, and other similar chat programs, have created a whole new language, let alone the ability for complete strangers to interact who never would have before. These are advances in society that are valued, not cursed. Yet we, as people, should never lose sight of the past.

An expression that I'm often fond of is that you only appreciate things in life when they're in the past. We all should remember the simple joys of just hanging around with friends, talking, and doing absolutely nothing of importance. Equally valued though, is the pick up game of wiffleball or street hockey, a nice lazy day out enjoying the Indian summer that the Valley is currently experiencing, or a good old-fashioned snowball fight, which I'm sure there will be many opportunities for in the coming months.

Many afternoons I come down to the Collegian and find people sitting around at their respective computers with some side conversations going on. Everyone has a web page open and is busy doing something in the cyber world. This past Tuesday afternoon was different though. It was almost sort of eerie: a group of college students sitting around without a single IM or website to be found. To be honest, it was like something out of the Twilight Zone. Too bad Rod Serling wasn't around to see it all unfold.

Letter to the editor

To the editor:

I am writing in response to your article "Clean up the Greek: Bringing back respect" that was published in your Oct. 1 edition. The article refers to the fraternity and sorority housing as "eyesores" that are "repugnant" and "disgraceful" to view. The unidentified writer of the article goes on to write, "(Greek) houses that would otherwise be condemned are covered in chipping paint, (and) tacky signs." The author goes on to urge the Greek system to clean up its houses in order to gain the respect of the community.

It is with total lack of responsibility that the Collegian published such a poorly researched article. It is very evident that the author has never been to a sorority house by the fact that she has the fortitude to pair its structure with those of the fraternity houses. The sorority houses are of an extremely high caliber and are virtually mansions. One can reallize this by simply glancing at the outsides of these houses.

It is with further ignorance that the author goes on to trash fraternities for the appearances of their houses. The author is obviously referring to the fraternities that reside on North Pleasant Street, which is commonly referred to as "frat row." Are the student houses on Philip St. and in other places around Amherst really of a higher caliber than ours? I think not. Again, if the author had done a shred of research on the topic, they would realize that every house on the row is rented. The fraternities are responsible for the trash and tidiness of the house but they are not responsible for any major structural or aesthetic problems since they only leave the house. Why would a fraternity pour money (which most of them do not have) into renovations of a house it does not even own. It is not the fraternities' faults that their landlords are negligent with the upkeep of their houses. The school is well aware of who owns the fraternity houses and could put pressure or money into their improvement.

Instead the school, like the Collegian, elects to complain to those that simply rent houses about their appearances. The author of the article also ignores such fraternity houses as Theta Chi, and Sigma Phi Epsilon that do not lie on the row and hold very nice facilities.

It is with complete irony that the house I belong to, Alpha Epsilon Pi, is cited for our improvement on our lawn and the painting of our house which the author of the article cites as taking place this past summer. First of all, our house was painted last year, which may be the reason that other fraternities do not follow our lead since our improvements seem to go unnoticed. A back-handed slap is taken at my chapter as it is written that my "fraternity is now respectable, at least in appearance." It is extremely ironic that out of all the things my fraternity does, you choose to write something about our lawn.

I may be mistaken however, and maybe a new lawn does overshadow the blood drive, clothing drive, food drive, time we spend cleaning a local highway, working at a soup kitchen, having a virtual 3.0 chapter GPA, holding positions in the SGA, participating in numerous school activities, and even having a member that works for the Collegian. No, you are right, a nice new front lawn is definitely noteworthy above all of our other accomplishments.

I am sick and tired of the prejudices that the fraternities receive on this campus. All the other fraternities that reside on campus do some form of community service and try to give something back to the community. The average person that lives in the dorms or off campus makes no such effort. I would guarantee as well that if you randomly selected five people from the dorms and five members of my house, my brothers would have a higher GPA. The School Of Management is virtually a secondary home for a large portion of the Greek communities.

So what is it that makes someone drive by during a candlelight vigil for September 11 on fraternity row and yell, "Frats suck, frats are gay?" Is it really as your editorial cites the reason that "the administration can continue to complain about their noisy, riotous parties," that makes them look down on us as well. I guess it is all right with the school to have almost a thousand people at the Townehouses throwing beer bottles at police officers, but it is not all right for the fraternities to have controlled parties that are registered with the police. It is easy for the school to pretend that fraternities are the cause of all the problems in the student body. They would like to pretend that without fraternities partying would cease. This is naive to believe in a college town.

The school cannot put pressure on places like Hobart and the Townehouses, but they can pressure Greek houses simply because we have Greek letters and have relations with the school. I may be wrong but I have never seen a riot on fraternity row like I have seen in Southwest, but it is the fraternities who cause problems, right? By no means are the fraternities perfect, but please have the decency not to judge us by how the outside of our houses look.

Adventure and drama: Comics offer it all

By Erik Taylor
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

A couple of years ago, comics were in danger due to their incredible low sales. Marvel comics, responsible for popular properties such as Spider-man, X-Men, and Daredevil to name just a few, had become unreadable. Even the readership that have been following for years was starting to thin. The storylines were perplexing and the public had lost interest. Newly assigned Editor-In-Chief Joe Quesada and President of Marvel Bill Jemas decided to start over.

The Ultimate universe was conceived. The formula was simple: take the origins of the most respected and beloved characters and remake them for a 21st century audience. Some of the industries most respected talents objected, stating that creating a new line of comics wasn't the answer to fixing problems caused by 40 or so years of continuity. Simply fixing the original material would be in their best interest and creating more comics based on similiar material is a waste. They had never planned to disregard the original material, but Marvel needed the hype behind the Ultimate line to jump-start its comeback. By updating popular books such as Spider-Man and X-Men, Ultimate Marvel had found its purpose and Marvel had its savior.

When Ultimate Spider-Man debuted in Fall 2000, it sold out immediately. Two months later, it sold on Ebay for well over 20 dollars. Almost as soon as the new issues hit the stands, they sold completely out and Marvel's no reprinting policy raised Ultimate Marvel's collectablity transforming the Ultimate line into a phenomenon.

That was over two years ago. Since then, Marvel comics have gone under some major changes. With the success of the Ultimate line, Marvel's popularity went through the roof, sparking interest in the original titles that people feared the Ultimate line would replace. Original Marvel property has had a great resurgence in readership, the Ultimate line is still high on the sale charts, and both are receiving critical praise for their art and storylines.

So what exactly is so great about these Ultimate titles? Here's a quick overview:

Ultimate Spider-Man
Writer: Brian Michael Bendis
Artist: Mark Bagley

When asked what makes Ultimate Spider-Man one of the most entertaining comics in the industry, the response is most often than not: Brian Michael Bendis. The ability to make the geeky, insecure 15-year-old Peter Parker a strong and stalwart superhero with great power and great responsibility is not only a tough job, but Bendis makes it completely believable.

"Never write down," Bendis wrote in Wizard's Ultimate Marvel Special. "People want to be challenged and intrigued and just because these characters are teenagers doesn't mean they have to be written like 'Saved By The Bell'."

This award winning writer not only brought us step-by-step through young Peter's evolution into Spider-Man, he is bringing welcomed twists to traditional characters and storylines. Joined with an artist with a long history with Spider-Man, Mark Bagley, the comic got off to a great start.

The first two arcs of Ultimate Spider-Man dealt with Peter's growth into a hero. Using his powers and hiding behind a mask, Peter uses his gift to honor his Uncle Ben and to fight crime. The serum-infected Spider (a welcomed twist from the original radioactive spider) that bit Parker was the brainchild of Norman Osborne, the brilliant scientist and father to Peter's friend Harry. After witnessing the effects his serum had on Peter, he injects himself, tragically transforming himself into the Green Goblin. A hulking green mutated version of Norman who seeks the death of his family and Parker/Spider-Man.

After Spider-Man defeats this first "Supervillain," he confronts the Kingpin of crime, battles a psychotic Doctor Octopus, evades Kraven the Hunter and his camera crew (a "Crocodile Hunter"-type looking to hunt Spider-Man), and begins to date Mary Jane. With all of these epic battles taking place, Bendis remembers to focus on Peter's life in High School. He still is always late to class and gets grounded by his Aunt May, all due to his secret identity as Spider-Man.

Future stories for Spider-Man will see the return of Green Goblin in a far more perilous way than before. Spider-Man will also deal with Nick Fury of S.H.I.E.L.D., the Chameleon will make Peter's life hell, and Venom will be getting the Ultimate twist. "The toughest part of doing Ultimate characters is deciding what to change about these characters' origins." So far so good, Ultimate Spider-Man is still one of the highest selling and critically acclaimed comics out right now.

Ultimate X-Men
Writer: Mark Millar
Artist: Adam Kubert

Black, Hispanic, Gay, Lesbian, Jewish...Mutant? The comic book world during the 60's had their version of racism. Mutants are humans born with an X-Factor gene, mutating them at puberty, and granting them spectacular powers and/or hideous disfigurations. The world is afraid of this change, fearing for their safety as their genetic "replacements" are emerging. On the mutant's point of view, it is basically split into two mentalities.

Professor Charles Xavier opened his Xavier Institute For The Gifted as a haven for mutants. There, his "X-Men" learn of their abilities and strive to teach people that Mutants are people too and should not be judged by natural genetic difference.

Erik Lensherr, also known as Magneto, believes a war is coming between Mutant kind and Humanity. Being a Jewish man and a survivor of the Holocaust, Magneto has claimed to see mankind's "tolerance." Before the horrors of the past repeat, Magneto lashes out at a mankind he sees as inferior to his mutant brethren.

The stylish splendor of cherries

By Andrea Gross
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

In the latest trends in U.S. popular culture, cherries are popping up all over. Adorned by today's hottest fashion designers, everything from shirts to pajamas to underwear to jewelry is sporting the round little crimson fruit.

Kristen Craig, a native Californian and now a University of Massachusetts freshman explained her perception of the trend.

"My little sister has a whole cherry ensemble complete with a shirt, necklace and hair piece," Craig said. "I thought it was some trendy California thing, but it seems to be beyond my home state."

The fashion certainly does extend beyond California and the west coast, as Leigh Soares, another UMass freshman from Cape Cod, observed.

"I have seen a lot of clothes with cherries on them recently," Soares reported. "I've seen slippers, sleep pants and T-shirts in the Delia*s catalog. I own a pair of light blue boxers with cherries on them from Old Navy."

Sarah Clark, a member of the public relations department at Wal-Mart, agreed that an abundance of merchandise with the cherry logo has sold well in recent months.

"The cherry design is one that is very popular today," Clark explained when ask for a reason behind such skyrocketing sales. "It is very popular with our customers."

Dorm series examines UMass life
Coolidge tower floor gets first look

DEBRAE MIDGLEY/COLLEGIAN

Coolidge in Southwest towers over the marching band. Today's dorm profile looks at Coolidge's 13th floor.

By Desirae Mix
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

In reading this new series on University of Massachusetts dorm life, you'll get a little taste of campus dorms (no matter where you reside). You'll also find out if the residential stereotypes are actually true. (You know the ones – Southwest's full of parties, and Northeast's full of bookworms.) And with each story an expose on different campus areas, you'll find out more about general UMass life. You can't lose.

This week's focus is the 13th floor of Coolidge, one of the tower dormitories in Southwest.

What's not to love about living in a tower, you ask? Maybe it's waiting 15 minutes just to get an elevator. Or perhaps it's seeing your neighbor change in the adjacent corner room. Possibly it's hearing the marching band practice at 8 a.m. on Saturday. But, of course, that could just be a Southwest thing.

Actually, the real reason to love living in a tower is the ability to have your own little community within one building.

There are roughly 500 people in one Southwest tower (and believe me, that's a lot of people trying to cram into elevators at 2 a.m. on a Sunday morning during a fire drill). As such, approximately 30 people live on each floor, and it seems a great way to make quick, diverse, and quite interesting friends.

As you walk out of the elevators onto Coolidge's 13th floor, you can tell this noise is just part of the natural ambiance. The sounds themselves are diverse. To the left, you can hear Janis Joplin blaring. To the right, the sounds of underground hardcore rap echo through the hall. Of course, every wide-open room fills the floor with America Online Instant Messenger rings. Walk down the hall a bit further, and you'll hear the sounds of Guns N' Roses blaring from the bathroom – courtesy of Rick the Maintainer.

Rick is a great representative of a dormitory. His friendly attitude is much like the people on the floor, and he takes the time daily to chat with the floor's residents.

"I think the maintainer makes your floor," Rick explained.

Stop and think for a moment of who does the little, often-unnoticed jobs mandatory to maintaining a comfortable home – just think, for example, of who cleans up after a really great party. But Rick loves nothing more than interacting with the kids on each floor. He relates to some of the similar problems residents have, because he has three children of his own roughly the same age as average college students.

An abstract plot leads viewers on a crazy journey

SEX AND LUCIA
Directed by Julio Medem
Starring Paz Vega and Tristan Ulloa
In Spanish, with English Subtitles
Playing at Academy of Music, Northampton

Can someone please tell me what's going on in movies nowadays? It seems as though that every other movie that gets released wants to be some sort of psychedelic nightmare. No sooner does Tom Cruise's reality get refracted through a prism in Vanilla Sky, than Gary Sinise finds he's turned upside down in Impostor. Life isn't just being run through a hall of mirrors; it's being run through a hall where the mirrors are cracked. It's now vogue to be confusing, confounding, to be messy and sloppy and irritatingly out to lunch.

Sex and Lucia exists in a world where reality has transmogrified into rubber. It opens near a remote tropical isle with an ocean sex scene between two strangers on the night of the man's birthday. Then it continues with Lucia (Paz Vega) coming home to find her boyfriend, Lorenzo (Tristan Ulloa, who resembles a Spanish Liev Schreiber) has left and has been involved in a car accident that may have left him dead.

Cut to six months earlier. Lorenzo is a writer struggling with writer's block while working on his second book. During lunch one day with his friend, he meets Lucia, a stranger who professes her deep love for him and requests she move in with him. Lorenzo understandably looks a bit uncomfortable with this strange girl but takes her out dancing anyways. They fall into a torrid affair.

Fine. But then things begin to go haywire. Lorenzo has a daughter with another woman he has never seen. She has been staying with a girl named Belen (Elena Anaya), an older teenager who's the daughter of a retired porn actress. Lorenzo embarks on an affair with Belen to get closer to his daughter, Luna...or does he?

Are these the events that transpire Lorenzo's reality, or are they parts of his new

The best thing about this floor is being able to go to any room and feel completely welcomed. Even Rick lends an ear for venting when needed and is always great with advice and ego boosting.

But perhaps many a floor experiences likewise situations. So, is floor 13 special then, you wonder? Surely, most know all about the recognition the 14th floor got with the goat head in the sink. And while floor D cannot guarantee the thrill of decapitated farm animals, its excitement level comes pretty damn close. How about, for instance, the couch washing machines and tables that met the ground from the window two years ago by some disgruntled Red Sox fans? Now, that's some teamwork.

There is also the feeling that you can really count on the people who live on the floor. Do you need tape? Milk? Porn? The people on the 13th floor of Coolidge can supply it at any time of the day – from the level of bonding that already exists between them.

Also off-putting about this floor is Road Robin, yet limited three times and still throw one banging party? Didn't think so. Do most floors have Spring Break movie night where everyone gathers and shares videos of their week off, either in Cancun, Montreal or any where else where naked people congregate? Most likely not.

In the category of room decor, the 13th floor has its signs of individuality as well. The guys keep it pretty simple with basic colors and the occasional hot chick poster on the wall, but there's nothing particularly over the top. However, the girls' rooms are always entertaining. You can almost tell their personalities just by looking at their closet curtain. Posters from the 60s and 70s are fairly popular. It also seems like the girls keep their food in two places – either under the bed or neatly put away on a storage shelf. The guys seem to keep their food in two places as well – in the 50 sacks in their stomachs.

I albeit was all of the rooms on the floor are open to company at any time. In fact, if this floor had a theme song it would be "Where Everybody Knows Your Name" from "Cheers" or the "Three's Company" theme.

A typical moment on the 13th floor is always filled with friends. After having a bad day, it's practically guaranteed a resident walking off the elevator will see all his or her floor mates sitting around, reads and waiting to greet their neighbor and talk a bad day away as if it never happened. The floor even has a tendency to help dress lesbian lacking floor mates when they ask for help on what to wear that night. Movie night in someone's room or even watching "Saturday Night Live" clips and "Simpsons" re-runs on the computer are commonplace.

It's doubtful that every dorm is this close, making it all the more special. Emails got you bummed? Roommate making you crazy? Broke up with your loved one? Just need a drinking buddy? At least on Coolidge's 13th floor, that's why you have your floor mates.

novel being enacted on screen? We never get to find out. The movie cuts back and forth through the disintegrate relationship between Lorenzo and Lucia, Lorenzo's withdrawal into the novel and his secret bonds with Belen and Luna. From there on in, the movie takes a series of twists and turns that turn it into a knot. Ladies and gentleman, we're still in the clearest part of the movie.

There's no denying that Sex and Lucia can count as a turn on. It's a Euro art-porn drama that seems to consist, at first, of nothing but graphic sex. Vega spends a lot of the movie nude, much of the time gratuitously, and there are shots that aren't normally seen in even non-mainstream Hollywood films. The movie is nothing if not erotic.

But there is an inherent problem with filling a movie with this much sex. The director, Julio Medem, piles on the explicit sexuality as a way to patch holes in the movie (if we get to see frontal nudity, then we won't notice if the puzzle pieces don't quite fit together.) At first, Sex and Lucia seems like nothing but an excuse for presenting cinematic sex without meaning. (On a related note, I have to ask: what is up with foreign films turning to porn all of a sudden? There's a list of graphic films from across the pond now on the market: Romance, Baise-Moi, Intimacy and now this.)

In the end, Sex and Lucia strands its biggest asset. The entire cast terrifically acts out the movie, but the allure Vega is especially fine. She's by turns brave, sexy, vulnerable, cruel, sympathetic and frightened. She looks like Penelope Cruz, yet she acts with more soul than Cruz has done in most of her American films. Too bad Medem forgets to give her anything to do.

Sex and Lucia was shot in digital video format, but the cinematography is far from beauteous. Whenever it cuts to a beach shot, the natural light comes off has harsh and overly bright. Interior scenes are cleaner and warmer, but Medem should have stuck to film stock as the results look washed out.

Medem could have benefited from someone trying to tone him down. I'm not talking about the sexuality, but about his compulsive need to tie everything into a knot. The sex in Sex and Lucia is already kinky; the script doesn't need to be too.

could be inaccessible to new readers. Mark Millar and Adam Kubert went ahead and created Ultimate X-Men. The school is handled like a private school with all the flirting, trash talking and competitiveness intact...only everyone has super-powers. The creators wanted to take a more practical look at what it would be like.

"[We're taking] a whole new approach to the book," Millar explains. "Ultimate X-Men looked different when we launched because we ditched the superhero costumes and the traditional captions and employed modern storytelling and realistic dialogue."

The X-Men already had their share of challenges. The President was dragged naked out of the White House by Magneto during an assault on the capital only to be saved by the X-Men. Wolverine's past catches up to him as a secret government program called Weapon X kidnapped the X-Men and used them as weapons, forcing them to kill. Then Xavier's son Proteus, a reality-warping Mutant with a hatred for his father, nearly killed Iceman, kill Elizabeth Braddock (Psylocke), and forever changed the morale of the X-men.

This winter will see the Ultimate version of Phoenix, a God-like power that will invade Jean Grey's body. The X-Men consisting of Cyclops, Wolverine, Storm, Beast, Kitty Pryde and Colossus will have to face their biggest challenge in the form of their teammate Jean Grey as she becomes more powerful than anyone can possibly imagine.

The Ultimates
Artist: Brian Hitch

Say these occurrences were happening in real life. A teenage kid puts on tights calling himself Spider-Man and swings around New York City either saving people or being a serious threat, depending on whom you ask. The "Mutant Menace" has parents pulling children out of public schools for fear of Mutants walking the halls. And maniacs like Magneto assault the Nation's capital, destroying most of it, and nearly killing our President. What could our Government do to make us feel safer living in this new and dangerous world?

They create The Ultimates. A government-funded team of super-powered beings that face challenges our armed forces are incapable of facing.

They are a collection of the most experienced, brilliant and strongest protectiveheroes ever to walk the Earth. Millar shows us that this group is quite possibly the most dysfunctional group of people other than any cast of "The Real World."

Captain America, Iron-Man, Wasp, Giant-Man, Thor and Bruce Banner (Hulk), led by Nick Fury are more of a danger to themselves as proven in the first story line. The team is assembled and billions has been invested yet there is nothing for them to fight. Feeling outcast and ridiculed, Bruce Banner gives the team their first challenge; he injects himself with Hulk serum, releasing the rampaging beast into New York City. The Ultimates lead an army of soldiers and rescue crews into the city to take down the Hulk. After the Ultimates take down one of their own on their first mission, the Prozac-happy Giant-Man batters his wife (Wasp), and Tony Stark (Iron Man) happily embraces his alcoholism. This Ultimate twist on the classic "Avengers" is by far the best comic on the stands today.

In the upcoming months, the Ultimates will acquire some new teammates in the form of Scarlet Witch and Quicksilver (daughter and son of Magneto), and the Russian spy Black Widow. The change in the roster is due to the dangers of the job. Some heroes face death while some believe the job is not for them. They will also face a major alien invasion that will test the team more than ever before.

Why cherries though? Why not grapes or any other type of fruit? The answers may lie when looking at cherries' symbolization, for the tiny fruits are known to represent a variety of things dealing with sexuality and innocence:

"It [a cherry] represents a girlish charm – fresh and clean," as Craig phrased it.

And some authors would agree.

"Cherries are associated with virginity and love magick," wrote Eliza Fegley in the article "Spells and Spellcrafting," on the Web site sacredspiral.com.

Adding to this themed perception, The Dreamer's Dictionary: From A to Z... 5,000 Magical Mirrors to Reveal the Meaning of Your Dreams by Lady Stearn Robinson and Tom Corbett states that in a dream, "ripe cherries in a bowl (or off the tree) signify success in love."

Other students, however, disagree with such symbols, including Robert Houdlette.

"I don't think [a cherry] symbolizes virginity at all," he said. "It's more a sign of being young and easy."

Still others refute looking into the fruit's symbolism too deeply. Soares, for example, plainly views cherries on clothing as looking cute, while Clark does not feel as though they are symbolic of anything.

All that matters for clothing sales, said Clark, is "whatever it [a cherry] stands for, for teens."

Colleen Vispoli, a UMass freshman working at a Wal-Mart in North Reading, Mass., has also seen many articles of clothing with cherries on them pass through her counter.

"The most popular brands were 'Mary Kate and Ashley Olsen' and 'No Boundaries' clothing," Vispoli said. "The majority of the clothing was marketed towards young and preteen girls, and the most common objects I saw on this clothing were cherries."

Vispoli views the graphic as a bit more than a simplistic and cute picture, believing that cherries reflect an aspect of American culture.

"The cartoon-like image of the cherry may be seen as cute and innocent, yet the underlying sexual suggestiveness is ridiculously apparent," she said. "This is a product of our society, and the double standards that are set for young women. Young women must be sexual, yet a virgin. This causes confusion, and young girls find themselves stuck awkwardly between womanhood and childhood at a very early age."

Watch out fruit bowls! Fashion designers have been stealing your style, and cherries have been spotted on clothing and jewelry at many stores – including Old Navy, Claire's and Pacific Sunwear. Catalog's such as Delia*s sell cherry garments as well, and the company Wild Syde, located in Brick, N.J., also produces a clothing line called "Sweet Cherries," specifically geared towards selling sexy attire for exotic dancers and ordinary women who want to wear something hot.

The cherry fad should be out for a while, because for the most part, a large percentage of females are digging the trend. And after all, so many stores would not be selling cherry clothing if no one ever bought it. For now, it seems, fashion designs are like hot fudge sundaes – so much better with a cherry on them.

Will Guns N' Roses rise again?

Was it really true? Was it Axl Rose, one of the most legendary and controversial lead singers of rock n' roll, performing live at the recent MTV Video Music Awards? Was it he, who hasn't performed since 1992, as part of Guns N' Roses on stage screaming out a voice?

ROCK'N OUT with Samara Marblestone

Yes. It was Axl, but was it Guns N' Roses? Absolutely not.

As host Jimmy Fallon practically wet himself while announcing Guns N' Roses would conclude the Awards, I expected to see not only lead singer Axl, but also guitarists Slash and Izzy Stradlin, keyboardist Dizzy Reed, bassist Duff McKagan and drummer Steven Adler.

Well, at least I got to see Dizzy and Axl. Everyone else was brand new – three new guitarists (Robin Finck, Richard Fortus and Buckethead), a new bassist (Tommy Stinson), a new keyboardist (Chris Pitman) and a new drummer (Brian Mantia). I wouldn't call the two existing original members of Guns N' Roses by the band's name. I would call it a desperate attempt to recreate the success they once had with a brand new bunch of boys.

Axl has recently announced, according to MTV.com, that Guns N' Roses will be coming out with a new album entitled Chinese Democracy, under the Interscope Records label. Here's the catch: Axl can't confirm when the album will be released, even though the band has been working on it for years. All he says is it won't be out anytime soon.

"How do you make a whole bunch of guys into something that already was – and with the intensity of these players wanting to play this material?" Axl stated on MTV.com. Interscope Records has already released 26 tour dates for the so-called Guns N' Roses, beginning on Nov. 7 in Vancouver.

Now, is it fair for Axl to call the band Guns N' Roses, even though five out of seven of the members are new additions?

Let me think.

Hmm – definitely NOT.

Let me explain to you my little theory. When you think of Guns N' Roses, what comes to mind? Here's some help. I think of intense energy, an indescribable stage presence, Axl's yelping screams, Slash's puff of black hair and cigarette dangling from his mouth and original music that is still popular among a new generation of fans today.

My point? If Axl renamed his new band The Axl Rose Project, just like Joe Perry called his new band The Joe Perry Project when he temporarily broke away from Aerosmith in the mid-80s, it definitely wouldn't draw as much immediate excited attention as the title Guns N' Roses. Joe Perry failed in his new band. Will Axl share the same fate? Probably.

If Axl succeeds in his new "project," then hell has definitely become a bit more chilly than usual. I would much rather remember Guns N' Roses in a positive way, rather than remembering how the lead singer tried to recreate the magic that obviously died a decade ago. It's a pathetic attempt to teach new musicians to take the place of obviously irreplaceable ones.

"When you're high, you never, ever wanna come down," right Axl? Well, guess what. You've been down for about a decade. Accept that you're a rock n' roll legend, and don't wear out your welcome.

from the fringe on 16 and a conceded Toms bunker play on 17. Both teams then stood even and with strikeable approach shots on 18.

Unlike the gaudy finishers of other courses, the very best finishing hole in golf has no catchy tag or nickname. Simply put, it needs no introduction.

The call to cross water twice, the three-tiered green, the sickle drive and the sock-shaped approach swallowing bunkers provide the stage. The men and their clubs pen the storyline.

With the pin set on the third tier, Toms played his approach too conservatively, landing it on the bottom level, handing the hole's fate line to Langer's short irons.

The grim-faced German played a high, lofting shot that silenced the grandstand as it disappeared into the fog of Lower England. The crowd then came alive as Langer's play dropped from the clouds like winter's first flake, landing in the greenside rough.

The throngs swayed with emotion as the competitors attempted to slay the Brabazon's most infamous green. But Montgomerie lost the handle on his downhill, toward water pitch, as did Mickelson with his on-green chip, causing each team to settle for a bogey five and a half of the hole.

Just another thrilling chapter in the book you can't put down.

Griffin tore apart the Pride defense for 128 yards and partner in crime Anthony Riley ran for 93 of his own. Riley also threw a touchdown pass to quarterback Shawn Brady to close the third quarter.

The efficiency of Northeastern's offense is its greatest strength as its defense will keep the Huskies in any game. Add to that the fact that NU doesn't have to play Maine this season because of the A-10's 11-team format, and the Huskies could easily win the conference this year.

As for Hofstra, the early reports are that this is not the Pride of yesteryear. Losing the dynamic duo of Charlie Adams and Kahmal Roy at wide receiver and Rocky Butler under center has taken the air out of what was one of the country's best offenses last season. Ohio State transfer Ricky Bryant has been quite solid at wideout, but the inexperienced Ryan Cosentino may not have what it takes to make up for Hofstra's less-than-stellar defense. And when Trevor Dinimie and Vemba Bukula come up against a defense that can thwart the running game, Cosentino has to be the man. It will take a lot to bounce back for games at Villanova and against William and Mary over the next two weeks, so Hofstra could have four conference losses before October is over.

COURTESY VILLANOVA MEDIA RELATIONS

Brett Gordon had a career day in Nova's 30-26 win over James Madison this weekend, completing 40 passes for 421 yards.

Streak over for JMU

After shutting down the critics with back-to-back conference wins to open the season, James Madison was faced with by far its biggest test yet this season when Villanova marched into Harrisonburg this weekend. The Dukes were coming off an emotional double-overtime victory over Hofstra while the Wildcats barely dirtied their uniforms in a 45-5 dismantling of conference whipping post UNH.

Brett Gordon played as if he had something to prove and turned in a performance good enough to earn him Co-Offensive Player of the Week honors for Div. I-AA. All he did was go 40-for-57 for 421 yards and four touchdowns in an epic 30-26 victory over the Dukes. Gordon found nine different receivers in his career-best performance.

Nova's defense held JMU quarterbacks to a 10-for-25 performance and allowed only 149 yards rushing, including a blanketing of two-time Offensive Player of the Week Rondell Bradley. Things are looking good for the Wildcats, who should not have that much trouble with Hofstra and follow that with a Thursday night contest against Penn. What should scare Villanova are the three games after that, when they travel to Massachusetts, go home against William and Mary and then travel to Northeastern. Those three games will be critical if the Wildcats want to be playing in the last week of November.

JMU's first true test of the A-10 slate was a valiant effort that came up just short. Still, 13 of the team's points came on special teams, and Matt LeZotte was horrific under center. If the Dukes are to get back on the right track, then he will have to perform much better than that when JMU plays host to the Black Bears this weekend.

All roads lead through Orono

The cream of the crop in the conference appears to be Maine, as the Black Bears have vaulted all the way to third in both the Sports Network and ESPN/USA Today polls. An effortless 31-14 triumph over Rhode Island was the next rung in Maine's ladder toward a National Championship. Steven Cooper took home the A-10's Defensive Player of the Week Award by notching 3.5 sacks and five tackles for loss in the victory.

COURTESY MAINE MEDIA RELATIONS

Buck Buchanan Award candidate Stephen Cooper has been a key to the "Black Hole" defense this year.

The "Black Hole" defense held Jayson Davis to just four-of-13 passing on Saturday for a measly 51 yards. Rhody had some success running the ball, posting 208 yards on the ground, but three fumbles (one lost) stunted its forward progress.

Marcus Williams was a force for Maine, coming up just shy of 200 yards on 25 carries. The Black Bears as a team totaled 294 yards carrying the ball, a big reason why they posted more than 35 minutes of time of possession in the game. Maine is on the road for the next three weeks, heading to JMU, UMass and Florida International before coming home for a matchup with Hofstra.

The fact is, everyone knows Maine is the team to beat in the A-10 this year, so it will be a marked team, but after the UMass game, only a trip to Richmond appears to be a challenge during Maine's stretch run. The roads could be rocky for Maine though, as wideouts Paris Minor and Stefan Gomes were suspended from school for breaking the code of student conduct. That could slow down the offense, but the defense, which is far and away the team's greatest strength, will remain intact.

Rhody has now lost three straight games, and will play in-state rival Brown this weekend before a date with Northeastern the following one. Unless URI puts up a strong performance in its next homestand (Delaware, Richmond, JMU), the Rams will likely be near the bottom of the conference when all is said and done.

Tribe wins shootout over Hens

Musinski's 194 yards lead William and Mary's rejuvenated offense

By Matt Brady
Collegian Staff

Going into this weekend's matchup between William and Mary and Delaware, the two teams knew what was at stake. A loss would put one team (0-2 in conference and likely needing to win the rest of the games on its Atlantic 10 slate.

The vaunted Tribe passing attack took the turned and this game went to William and Mary in a shootout, 45-42. Rich Musinski, a first Team Atlantic 10 selection last year, hauled in nine passes for 194 yards and a pair of scores, while Dave Corles Jr. threw for 326 yards and no interceptions.

A 41-yard interception return by Billy Parker with just under two minutes to go in the game iced the victory for the Tribe, which has a week off before heading to Hofstra for a showdown with the Pride next week.

William and Mary came into the season ranked as the preseason No. 1 but back-to-back losses to start the season moved the Tribe down a couple of notches on everyone's rankings. Granted, those two losses were to Div. I-A Indiana and I-AA powerhouse Maine (more about this later), but there are still a lot of questions to answer for the Tribe.

The offense is obviously back with 107 points in its last two games, but defense is a huge weakness, as the team has allowed 73 in those two victories. In a conference where the strongest teams have efficient offenses and solid defenses, William and Mary's defense needs to shore itself up – fast.

Andy Hall threw for two touchdowns and ran for another for Delaware, but completed only 16 of his 37 pass attempts and threw a pair of interceptions on the game. Things get no easier for the Blue Hens, as they host red-hot Northeastern this week.

When Delaware defeated I-AA powerhouse Georgia Southern to start the season, head coach K.C. Keeler was immediately taken off the hot seat after taking over for Tubby Raymond. But unless things turn around fast for Keeler and his troops, they will be in the lower half of the conference when the season finishes, which is somewhat to be expected. With the departure of a coach whose staple, the Wing-T offense, was a team-oriented strategy that left when he went out the door, Keeler was given the task of creating a new unity that the Blue Hens had yet to deal with. Add to that a new starter under center, and it could be an ugly season for them.

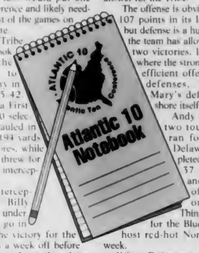
Conference newcomer Hofstra made its first visit to what is generally considered the toughest place to play in the A-10 when it journeyed to Parsons Field this weekend to do battle with Northeastern, which has emerged as one of the top teams in the conference due to the fact that it possesses arguably the best defense in Division I-AA.



Steve Anzalone and Adam Walter combined for 18 tackles, six of them for loss, and Art Smith made two interceptions, both of which led to NU touchdowns. The Huskies have now allowed 34 points in four games and appear to be, along with Maine, one of the two teams to beat in the A-10.

Brabazon's challenge

Tenth and 18th marks of perfection for Ryder

By Matthew F. Sacco
Collegian Staff

SUTTON COLDFIELD, ENGLAND – If the Ryder Cup is your church, than the De Vere Belfry is your Notre Dame Cathedral.

As host of four Cups, including Europe's two-match victory in the 34th edition of the biennial competition over the weekend, the Belfry has written itself into a large chunk of golf's good book.

And with the par-4 10th and 18th holes authoring more folk tales with each passing round, the Brabazon Course is poised as the stage for match play golf.

Success in match play rests almost exclusively on decision-making and risk taking.

Do I go for the green, do I lay up, do I hit the driver, do I chip or putt, do I strike with spin, do I play it safe, do I challenge the hazard?

These are all questions that golfers must ask themselves in match play. And the answers to those questions can very well determine the match.

So holes spawn more of these inquiries then the Belfry's bookend par-4s on the back nine. In three days of competition they were the indisputable lifelines of almost every match.

The 10th, a 311-yard Amadeus, beckons any golfer with a showman's heart.

Before the Matches, European captain Sam Torrance pushed for an extension of the Belfry's most famous hole, in order to deter the long-hitting Americans from attacking the pin and gaining an advantage over his more conservative side.

So instead of under 250 yards to carry the water, the dance floor now lay 264 yards from the tee, shadowed by a curtain of trees and fronted by a curving brook, offering no easy approach to the flag.

But for those boasting the insides to fly an unhridled drive into the belly of a slender, two-tier green, the reward is laudable.

Severiano Ballesteros was the first to conquer the 10th's fortified green in one, opening the door for the professional long ballers that scatter both tours at present.

Others may choose to roll a soft seven iron down the lane of a yawning fairway, thus politely opening the door for an indomitable opponent.

Case in point: Saturday's fourball match between Europe's Sergio Garcia and Lee Westwood and the United States' Tiger Woods and Davis Love III. The match stood all-square, the Europeans with the honor.

The Spaniard struck first, landing on the front fringe, just feet from the water. Westwood upped the ante with a monstrous thump to within 40 feet of the bucket.

Woods and Love were up next, drawing boos from the bowl of fans, as they followed captain Curtis Strange's orders to lay up. Neither American could drop a pitch to one-putt distance and Westwood birdied for the hole, giving Europe the lead and momentum.

During Friday's foursome session, hole No. 18 was the stage for the day's most compelling match between Phil Mickelson and David Toms and experienced Europeans Colin Montgomerie and Bernhard Langer.

Two holes down with three to play, the Stars and Stripes roared to all-square with a Mickelson chip-in

The 18th hole at Brabazon, designed by Dave Thomas, is considered one of the best and most challenging finishing holes in all of golf.

Week Four fails to provide relief for perplexed NFL fans

Apparently, Week Four is the time for the weird things going on in the National Football League to get even stranger. Now, there seems to be nothing that fans can take for granted:

Who won what?!?

So, let me get this straight, San Diego beat New England (21-14), Baltimore beat Denver (34-23), Detroit beat New Orleans (26-21), Jacksonville beat the Jets (28-3) and Arizona beat the Giants (21-7).

Right.

Where am I, and what have you done with the NFL? This is insane. The Chargers look pretty good this year, but they shouldn't have done much against the World Champs. Baltimore, Detroit, Jacksonville and Arizona are all terrible. Then again, so are the Giants and Jets, so I guess those Cardinals and Jaguars wins are a wash.

So who's the best team in the league?

Last week, the Pats and Dolphins were clearly the two best teams in football. This week, they both lost to mediocre teams. The only undefeated teams remaining are Oakland and San Diego, but I still wouldn't put any money on either. I'll stick with my Super Bowl picks as the best teams in the league for now (Green Bay and Denver), but this is really getting ridiculous.

If the NFL was college football...

Here is how my poll would look:

1. Oakland (3-0) – This one hurts. After all the whining, it would have been nice to see them suffer a similar fate to the Rams. They are old, so at least they have that going for them, which is nice.

2. San Diego (4-0) – Impressive win over New England. You have to love that this team essentially traded QB Michael Vick for QB Drew Brees and RB LaDainian Tomlinson, and it looks brilliant.

3. New England (3-1) – The Pats hadn't lost in 12 games, they were due for a letdown at some point. This week's game against Miami will prove their worth, one way or the other.

4. Miami (3-1) – Miami is scaring Pats fans. They have finally found a terrific running back (Ricky Williams) and a game-breaking receiver (Chris Chambers). Combine them with a QB who doesn't make mistakes (Jay Fiedler) and one of the best defenses in the league, and they could easily win the whole thing this year.

5. Philadelphia (3-1) – The only NFC team in the Top Five. Amazing how good Donovan McNabb is. The Eagles have been running the ball by committee with some success and their defense has been solid.

Notice a trend? The top four teams are in the AFC. How did that happen? The Rams are dead, I think. The Niners don't have the defense. The Packers have no D as well. The Bears should have traded for Bledsoe and the Saints just don't seem to have the proverbial "it." At least not yet.

Running backs of doom

What a week for big-time running backs. Shaun Alexander rips off five touchdowns in the first half against Minnesota Sunday night. The Alabama alum ended up with 251 total yards from scrimmage.

Shipp did, however, sprain the medial collateral ligament in his left knee in the game. He will try to practice on a brace this week, but is listed as doubtful for Sunday's game against Carolina.

Westbrook saw limited action this week against Houston, getting just seven yards on four carries. The Eagles beat the Texans Sunday, 35-17.

How my predictions are doing...

Here's a look at where my picks stand after four weeks:

AFC East: New England (3-1, Tied – 1st)
AFC North: Pittsburgh (1-2, 2nd)
AFC South: Tennessee (1-3, 3rd)
AFC West: Denver (3-1, 3rd)
NFC East: Philadelphia (3-1, 1st)
NFC North: Green Bay (3-1, 1st)
NFC South: Tampa Bay (3-1, Tied – 1st)
NFC West: St. Louis (0-4, 4th)

Well, you'll have to forgive me for the Rams and Steelers, but I'm pretty sure everyone made that mistake. At least my Super Bowl picks (Green Bay, Denver) still hold up pretty nicely.

A stupid Moss gathers no stone

I don't really want to even discuss this, but Randy Moss' little traffic violation happened right after I finished last week's column. Personally, I can't imagine anyone having sympathy for a "man" who would drive into a traffic officer and refuse to stop the car until she had fallen off the hood. But hey, I am just part of the stupid media which blows these things out of proportion.

Moss is promising that someday we'll hear his side of the story. Can't wait for that one.

We still have a chance for a team to go 0-16 this season. Here are the teams to watch and root against:

St. Louis (0-4), Minnesota (0-4), and Cincinnati (0-4) are the three left on the list. Too bad the Lions beat the Saints this week, I really thought they had a chance to make my dream come true.

Maybe the "Bungals" can do it for us. After all, they've started Gus Frerotte, Jon Kitna, and Akili Smith at quarterback in four weeks – never a sign of multiple victories.

Let's keep our fingers crossed.

My fantasy team

The Rat Pack faced some tough competition this weekend in Rusty Aries. My squad had the bad luck of taking on a team that included Trent Green (QB-KC), Tony Gonzalez (TE-KC), Donald Driver (WR-GB and the Oakland defense. Those four almost outscored my entire team. Seriously.

A-10 running backs watch

Philadelphia's Brian Westbrook, a Villanova graduate, has been the big star from the Atlantic 10 so far this season, but it was UMass' own Marcel Shipp who impressed for the Arizona Cardinals this week.

Shipp was the team's leading rusher (92 yards) and receiver (39 yards). No. 31 scored Arizona's last two touchdowns in the 21-7 win over the Giants.

LaDainian Tomlinson destroyed the Pats this week, rushing for 217 yards, including two long touchdown runs (58 and 37 yards) in the Chargers' 21-14 win.

Oft-injured Jaguar running back Fred Taylor had an amazing Sunday against the Jets. The Florida alum went for 142 yards on 21 carries, caught three balls for 95 more yards, and scored a touchdown in Jacksonville's 28-3 win. If No. 28 can stay healthy, he could very well lead the conference in rushing.

How about the AFC West

There are a few tough divisions in the NFL this season, but none more than the AFC West. Check this out:
San Diego (4-0)
Oakland (3-0)
Kansas City (2-2)

And the Chiefs could easily have beaten New England in Week Three.

Once the teams start playing each other, the division should sort itself out better, but it is beginning to look like a lock that at least one of the AFC's two wild card teams will come from the West.

Community rallies for awareness

JAMES SCHAFFER/COLLEGIAN

Members of Girls Inc. a Holyoke mentor group along with other local social welfare organizations marched through downtown Holyoke during yesterdays Domestic Violence Awareness Month march and rally.

By Amy O'Neill
Collegian Staff

The lives of 16 Massachusetts domestic violence victims did not go unnoticed yesterday thanks to the Womanshelter/Compañeras and the 70 plus community members that turned out in Holyoke for the third annual, "Remember the Victims, Celebrate the Survivors, Support Those Affected by Domestic Violence," march and rally. The event was held to highlight the beginning of Domestic Violence Awareness Month.

The march began in the parking lot across the street from the War Memorial Building at the corner of Maple and Appleton Streets and finished at the National Heritage Park four blocks down the road.

President of the Latin American Motorcycle Association, Edwin R. Colon, who came out specifically for the event, followed behind a Holyoke police car that cleared the streets in order for the march to proceed. This was the second year that the Latin American Motorcycle Association has participated in this event.

"We come out to support the women's organization," Colon said.

According to Colon, they have raised a significant amount of money the last three years for the center by doing 60 to 100 mile sponsored rides in which for every mile they rode, they were pledged a certain amount of money. This year they have raised $1,300.

In addition, community service organizations came out from all over the area to show support including the Sisters of St. Joseph in Springfield and a Holyoke group called Girls Inc. The Girl's Inc. group, starts teaching girls as young as four years old to age 13 to be "strong, smart and bold," according to the banner that they carried throughout the march.

The Greater Hulyoke Youth Service Choir, which is affiliated with Americorps, was also there supporting the organization, with 23 students who will be doing community service in Holyoke for the next 10 months.

"We thought it would be a great way for the students to get involved with the community right away, and its such an important subject to touch on," Tracey Manijuk, Community Outreach Coordinator, said.

At the park where the march ended there was a display of the 16 victims and a description of the circumstances of how their lives were taken was placed on each memorial.

"It goes against everything that I believe in regarding life," said Roberta Mulcahy, a Sister at St. Joseph's. "It makes me very sad in my heart but I also know that I can't stay there. It shows

Restroom Revolution gathers at Stonewall

By Morris Singer
Collegian Correspondent

Members of the Transgender Activist Network as well as members of the Gay-Lesbian-Bisexual and Transgender community on campus have established the organization the Restroom Revolution to raise awareness of their need for neutral or non-gender-specific bathrooms.

The group met from 5 to 7 p.m. yesterday in the Stonewall Center to ask the University of Massachusetts administration to recognize their situation and begin work to remedy it. According to Mitch Boucher, one of the people in charge of Restroom Revolution, gender-segregated bathrooms cause a serious problem for most transgender students.

"The issue for us is that most transgender people do not fit any of the categories as our culture defines them," Boucher said. This is the basic reason for the formation of the group, which has been attempting to make progress to this end for an entire year.

Boucher claimed that the work required to create gender-neutral bathrooms on campus would not be a formible task. The group believes that a process of conversion of some single-stall bathrooms would be a step in the right direction.

"All it would really take is changing some of the signs," on the bathroom doors to no longer reflect a gender-specific requirement, he said.

Eventually the group hopes to establish one gender-neutral bathroom in each building on campus and also one on every third floor of dormitory buildings. According to Restroom Revolution, the problem arises, however, when taking away bathrooms already assigned to a particular gender, and re-designating them as gender-neutral. The bathroom no longer counts as either a male bathroom or a female bathroom, and thus renders most, if not all buildings no longer compliant with building code.

AJ Crittendon, one of the founding members of Restroom Revolution, is skeptical of the existence of these codes and has formed a committee within the group to research these matters.

"We've never seen these codes or laws written down on paper," he said.

Crittendon said that he has met other challenges as well since he first started his attempts to initiate change. He said that he has been taking the proper steps to help his cause, but that people in the administration are reluctant to respond.

"Basically, no one really got back to me. Nothing ever really came of what I did."

Crittendon claimed that at one point he was successful in negotiations to create two gender-neutral bathrooms – one in Prince dormitory and one in Wheeler dormitory – but efforts were later curbed by increasing parental concern before either of the gender-neutral bathrooms ever appeared on campus.

One such concern is for the safety of those using the bathrooms. Those concerned argue that allowing equal access to the bathroom for both men and women could facilitate sexual crimes. To that, Crittendon replied that in the case of single-sex bathrooms, the gender-specific sign on the door does not prevent someone willing to commit a crime from entering. Because of this, Crittendon views the two situations as equal safety concerns.

Restroom Revolution is now organized in their efforts to make change, as they see it, in the simple interest of fairness to all people.

Ed Kammerer, one of the members of the group, expressed the persistence of Restroom Revolution when he said that he wants the community to know that the group will continue to meet and work towards their goal.

"Be aware that it is not just a one time deal," he said.

In fact, four committees have now been established within the group, all focused on affecting change from different avenues of pursuit. One committee is in charge of researching legal issues that the group may face as it continues towards its goal. Another is responsible for publicity, including flyers, letters, and press releases. A third committee has the tasks of organizing petitions, rallies, and other things that "put pressure on the University." The fourth committee is interested in starting relations with other colleges and possibly coordinating efforts with similar groups at those schools.

Restroom Revolution will hold its next meeting on Oct. 23 at 5 p.m. at the Stonewall Center.

SGA Senate holds first meeting after elections

By Kristin Shrewsbury
Collegian Staff

Yesterday evening newly elected Student Government Association Senate members were sworn in at their first Senate meeting of the semester where they decided to eliminate the SGA Diversity Committee. New and old senators then participated in a training session to grasp the rules and regulations surrounding the Senate.

Members of the Executive Cabinet were present at the meeting to talk about what they plan to bring to the Senate, as well as describe their positions within the SGA.

"A lot of hard work goes into the Senate and being here," Student Trustee Bill Powers said. "My job is to represent you and the rest of the campus and hopefully you will take a step back and take in all you can from this experience."

Powers further explained to the Senate the powers and rights that they hold within the University of Massachusetts.

"The Senate has three different powers, the power to make change and exercise your rights, you have the power to vote on issues on behalf of the student body and you have the power to influence parliamentary procedures," Powers said.

President Carr also expressed similar thoughts regarding the Senate and the power they hold within the University.

Charles DiMare, director of student legal services, was also present at last nights meeting in an effort to explain to the Senate their rights and obligations to the SGA and to the University. DiMare explained that the Senate has the right to question any policy going through the administration as well as to communicate and work with the other governances on campus.

"The University of Massachusetts Board of Trustees were empowered to choose groups to act as a governing authority on every UMass campus, and they picked you when this University was getting started," DiMare said. "You have the authority to delegate new policies and you are have a primary responsibility to govern this University."

DiMare continued by discussing the Wellman Document, which states what the SGA's rights and responsibilities are as a governing body under the University. DiMare further explained that it's the Senates right to be informed of any policy changes occurring on campus.

"It's critical that you have a working relationship with all the campus governing councils," DiMare said. "And you may need to remind them of this from time to time."

Speaker Dan Saunders encouraged the Senate to get involved and explained that this year will be a different Senate than the previous years. Saunders also announced that he would be removing the Diversity Committee, a committee previously part of the Senate.

"I think it's a waste of time and we

Memoriam for Jordan

By Scott Enright
Collegian Correspondent

A tribute to the late author June Jordan was held yesterday evening in the Top of the Campus room on the eleventh floor of the Campus Center.

Jordan was one of the Nation's most frequently published African-American female authors. She was a poet, novelist, professor, performance artist, and political activist.

The evening featured a number of lecturers from several departments on campus. Graduate students shared their words and the group 2050 read a selected poem.

Emcee Alexandrina Deschamps was pleased with the amount in attendance at the event. The room was filled, with late attendees standing against walls.

"What started out as a seed grew into a large turnout," Deschamps said.

Ester Terry, a professor of African-American studies at the University opened was the evening's first speaker. Terry told of the pleasure she had found in sitting with Jordan five years ago when Jordan visited the University.

"She showed up without a trace of arrogance...She was quite simply exactly as her writing...Indeed she blessed us on that day," Terry said.

Terry explained that Jordan had come to the University to "check things out." She wanted to decide if she would like to join the teaching staff at the University of Massachusetts.

"She would have brought things together. More than anyone I knew, she could have made ties between women's studies, the Afro-American studies Department, and the English department..." Terry said.

Terry stared into the crowd and spoke softly about

JAMES SCHAFFER/COLLEGIAN

Students and faculty assembled atop the Campus Center yesterday to hear speakers such as Esther Terry a professor of Afro-American studies at UMass remember the late June Jordan.

Jordan's illness and on her passing.

"Thank God we have her writings that she left for us and for the rest of the world."

Enoch Page, an associate professor in the anthropology department spoke of her death and of the significance of her life.

"I felt a shock and grief, but only for a moment. In that moment I began to feel how deeply she had impacted my life...She was a fighter that would not take no for an answer."

Page focused his lecture on race issues and whiteness. He commented that Jordan was determined to love her enemy and that she was able to receive an education without ever "selling out to whiteness."

Five College Women's Studies Research Associate Isis Nusair spoke next about recent conflict with Palestine, Israel, and Iraq. Nusair targeted the potential war with Iraq and used Jordan's words to emphasize the situation.

"We bombed Iraq...we bombed schools...we bombed libraries...we bombed everything that moved and everything that did not move. We bombed the darkness and the sunlight. And I am not pleased. None of this fits into my notion of things going very well."

The next speaker was graduate student Mirangela Buggs, majoring in social Justice Education.

"We can't wait for anyone else to do it, it is up to us. We are the ones we have been waiting for," she said.

Project 2050, a New World Theater performance, recited a poem and then concluded with a personal comment about September 11th. They related the tragedy to events that have been occurring in the third world.

"Third world countries have been crying for years. On Sept. 11 we awoke to their tears."

Those in attendance felt that the tribute to Jordan was a success because it shared her writings and expressed her voice as a political activist.

me that we need to work towards something better."

The rally then continued with speakers including: Carmen Nieves, community educator and event coordinator from the Womanshelter/ Compañeras; Mayor of Holyoke, Michael J. Sullivan; Scott Girard, coordinator of the Men Overcoming Violence program (MOVE) at the Men's Resource Center of Western Mass., and closed with a song by vocalist Yesse Mateo and guitarist Anthony Diaz written about the experiences of a domestic violence victim.

"This year, our rally is not a Womanshelter/ Compañeras rally, this year this rally is a community rally," Nieves told the crowd.

The Womanshelter/ Compañeras answered over 2,000 hotline calls last year, according to Nieves.

"These calls were not only for domestic violence intervention or for emergency situations, they were for information," Nieves said. "We are also there for the family member, the friend, or the neighbor. We are there for everyone."

She encouraged people who know others in abusive relationships to be patient with their loved ones trying to leave, saying that according to the FBI, it takes someone on average, seven times attempting to leave before they actually get away from the situation.

"I want you to know, sincerely, that just by being here, just by acknowledging that there is something called domestic violence, is very helpful to them," Nieves said. "We are the experts on knowing that everyday, the perpetrator may kill someone in their relationship."

"A lot of times when you go to these types of events they are primarily women, and it is frustrating for organizations like ours to just have women," Karen Cavanaugh, a member of the staff at Womancenter/ Compañeras said.

"We are really lucky because we have developed a natural relationship with the community, so we have young men who feel just as strongly about the position as we do which is so rewarding."

Girard, who recently appeared on Oprah, discussed his experiences with the Men's Resource Center and how they inspired him to stop his violent behavior and help other men to do the same.

Girard came to the program in April of 1990, when he realized he was using violence on his family to try and be in control.

"I felt like I had no control over other things in my life and they were something that I knew I could control-my wife and my kids," Girard said.

He said that men are brought up to believe they don't need any help, that they should always be in control and are the supposed to be the dependable ones; he realized that he had a problem, and that his preconceptions about what it meant to be a man were not true. After completing a 26-week program, Girards's wife and he decided that they wanted to speak out to others about domestic violence and help others.

"There hasn't been a lot to get to the source of the problem which is us, the men," Girard said.

The Men's Resource Center offers programs for men to become involved with to help them with deal with their violence problems and help them through these situations. For information on these programs or to be involved, contact the Men's Resource Center in Amherst at 253-9887. For information on the Womanshelter/Compañeras contact 538-9717.

Programs across the valley will take place throughout the month to further awareness of Domestic Violence not just within the traditional married setting, but in the many alternative relationships and young couples that also statistically experience violence as well.

Fine Arts welcomes two new professors

By Hirak Shah
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

The University of Massachusetts College of Humanities and Fine Arts welcome two new faculty, Marylou Speaker Churchill and William Hite, this fall.

Marylou Speaker Churchill is the newest professor of violin at UMass. Churchill joined the Boston Symphony Orchestra (BSO) in 1970 and was appointed to the position of Principal 2nd Violin of the BSO and the Boston Pops in 1977.

During her time with the BSO, Churchill worked with such conductors as Seiji Ozawa, Sir Colin Davis, and James Levine just to name a few. Along, with the BSO, and the Boston Pops, Churchill worked as a soloist with the Ural Philharmonic (Russia) as well as orchestras in Brazil, and Japan. She performed with the Boston Symphony Chamber Players from 1993 until her retirement in 2000; her performances included tours in Europe and South America and a Grammy nomination for her recording of the Shostakovitch Piano Quintet.

Churchill was invited by Sir Georg Solti to be Faculty and Principal second violin of the Carnegie Hall Solti Project in 1994, and a year later to perform in the Orchestra du Monde concert held in Geneva, Switzerland to celebrate the United Nations' 50th anniversary.

Furthermore, she coaches for the New World Symphony Orchestra in Miami Beach, Florida, and has been a violin coach for the Asian Youth Orchestra in Hong-Kong as well as youth orchestra festivals in New Zealand and the U.S. Following this she was the chair of the string department at the Preparatory School at the New England Conservatory for ten years.

"I look forward to teaching the kids," says Ms. Churchill when asked what she is looking forward to doing at the UMass.

She is also looking forward to, "working with colleagues" in concerts.

Ms. Churchill will be performing chamber music on Dec. 8 at Benzansom Hall, and for the spring orchestra will be performing Mozart's symphony conzart viola.

Joining Churchill in Amherst is her husband, conductor-cellist-administrator Mark Churchill and their twin daughters.

The second addition to the College of Humanities and Fine Arts is William Hite a professor of voice.

Hite has received acclaim for his performances with groups such as the American Symphony Orchestra, the Washington Bach Consort, the New York City Ballet, the National Arts Center Orchestra (Ottawa), the Handel& Haydn Society, and Boston Baroque under conductors Seiji Ozawa, and Craig Smith.

Hite's credits also include performing at the Boston Early Music Festival, where he appeared in the productions of Purcell's King Arthur, Rossi's Orfeo and Cavalli's Ercole Amante.

Hite is on a CD of Bach's St. John Passio" with Emmanuel Music on the Koch label, the Mozart Requiem with Andrew Parrott for Denon, and Handel's The Triumph of Time and Truth on the Centaur label. He is also featured on the award winning CDs with the Boston Camerata as well as with the medieval ensemble Sequentia.

Hite received his bachelors from the University of Kansas and a Masters in Opera Performance from the Boston Conservatory. He taught voice at Cornell University, and for the last 5 years at Boston University. He received a Tanglewood Fellowship Award in 1984 and 1985.

When asked what he would like to instill in his students he said, "a desire to express themselves through poetry and singing."

Hite has two upcoming performances. The first on Nov. 3 at Mount Holyoke will feature Handlin's Ode on Saint Sicily days. The second performance will be held on May 17 at the Fine Arts Center with the Pioneer Valley Symphony where he is performing Mike Tippet's Child of our Time.

Thus far he enjoys living in western mass with his wife and daughter; he also enjoys gardening, cooking, cycling, and racquetball.

need diversity in every aspect of all our committees," Saunders said. "Every issue has diversity within it and I hope people will agree with this. This committee has been a token position and we've made decisions in the past without thinking of their ramifications and I won't stand for it anymore."

Saunders continued to teach the rules and regulations of the Senate as well as allowed Senators the opportunity to ask questions surrounding the Senate.

In addition to the training session, two motions were passed on the Senate's Special Agenda. The Senate put their power into action as they voted to break two ties for Senate seats in Cashin and Kennedy Residential Halls.

"Now that we're all a Senate and we know what we want to do, we know what we have to do, and now we just have to do it," Saunders said. "I want to debate researched motions and submit motions, not just put a rubber stamp on it and send them off."

Energy was a key word presented last night by members of the Executive Cabinet as well as by Saunders, and members of the Senate expressed similar feelings.

"I wanted to get involved and people told me the best was to join the Senate and I figured that this would be the best way to get things done," said Amit Shah Orchard Hill Senator.

Carr agreed with Shah, explaining that he felt for the first time everyone who was present was because they are excited about getting involved.

"For the first time since I've been here, everyone seems happy and wants to get involved," Carr said. "And right now we have a great opportunity to do things on this campus."

The Dialogue on Faith and Reason

(2) UMass faculty and (1) grad student host an open hour of discussion, addressing topics like:

Are faith and reason contradictory?

How much can we know about religious claims anyway?

Has anyone messed with the Bible since it was originally written?

If God is loving & just, why does He permit evil?

If some say Jesus is "the only way," what about people in other religions?

In a university devoted to inquiry, is it a good idea to exclude spiritual views from the classroom?

Is "religious truth" different from "scientific truth"?

Civil disobedience

Right to rally

A right to protest. This is a constitutional right. At the University of Massachusetts we exercise this right.

Be it a rally to gain support for cut budgets, to encourage the funding of contracts, or to inspire the administration to change, as a student body we frequently use our right to protest as a means to get our message out.

It is disconcerting to see that this is not always the case.

This past weekend hundreds gathered in the streets of Washington D.C. to protest what they felt were unfair actions on the part of national officials and international organizations, namely the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank.

Voices are meant to be heard. No matter what the adage is about being seen rather than heard, a voice is a tool to communicate, and many voices were quieted this past weekend. Over 600 in fact.

The gathering of students, activists and generally concerned citizens was large, no argument, but there have been larger.

The group of protesters was loud, vocal and noticeable. There have been groups louder, more vocal and far more noticeable in the District of Columbia.

Still, the protests were stopped, the police arrested hundreds and held them on buses, the meetings went on, and national news picked up the whole story.

There is a chance, as there always is when 600 people or more are arrested, that some rights were trampled when the arrests took place. This is an issue that comes up every time there are arrests, every time there are protests.

However, the more important factor is that there are worthy questions unanswered because no one allowed them to be presented. There are issues that the protestors wanted to raise that couldn't be because they were arrested for blocking traffic, jaywalking or whatever other reason the Metro Police of D.C. used when arresting the activists.

We should be thankful that on campus issues are at least allowed to be made public. When ALANA group rallies are scheduled for the Student Union steps, the Campus Activities office arranges a podium for their use. When faculty groups rallying for increased funding, there are speakers and microphones at their disposal.

Whether provisions made are "bend over backward" steps taken by the university or not, at least there are no major strides taken to quash the rallies and protests on campus.

With the exception of last April's arrests of RA union supporters, the recent history of peaceful demonstration on campus has run incident free without mass arrests or riotous crowds.

Looking at our apparent national policies of arresting protestors, it is a fortunate thing that our university allows for civil disobedience, rallies and preservation of our right to protest.

"Heil Bush?" or "Go Dubya?"

MARK OSTROFF

And now, back to your regularly scheduled media mind-wash:

Oh boy, oh boy, oh boy! They just keep comin' and comin' don't they? Now it's getting personal... and here's where it gets good... In this corner, the Leader of the err... Free World! And in this corner... well, uh...Germany, I guess.

Believe it or not, this is not the first time, our unobjectionably elected president got compared to the guy we all love to hate.

Fidel Castro recently had a heef wit da prez, back in June. It was after a little spat when Bush called the Cuban President a "relic," and a "tyrant." Castro came back with a speech in front of thousands of Cuban citizens by saying, "The power and prerogatives of that country's president are so extensive ...that due to circumstances that fully escape the will of the American people, the world is coming under the rule of Nazi concepts and methods." Now, who wins this one? Well, I got to tell you the truth. The fact that Bush had reduced himself to sounding like a Marbleheader on vacation in Tijuana, when delivering yet another speech about freedom and stuff to Miami-Cubans, has made Fidel the more rational speaker of the two. Fidel may be putting the salt and pepper on his speech to his people, but at least he doesn't have to worry about being asked to resign anytime soon... that was a joke.

And even some Americans have gone far to compare Bush with Hitler. One of the larger implications comes from Robert Anton Wilson, author of the "Illuminatus! Trilogy," an underground cult classic, a must-read, and a must-have for all Goths and the occasional LSD freak. On Wilson's website, a typical web-nerd can read his occasional, and interesting "Thought of the Day." One of his thoughts makes hints to the characteristics of two men, one of whom is subtly described to be Bush and the other to be wearing a "funny mustache." Clever, yet out of the blue, Wilson loses this round because of a literary sucker punch to an unknowing Mr. President. The point goes to Bush, even though he has yet to figure out who the first guy in the riddle was... that was a joke.

And so now we have another Nazi oriented verbal assault on Dubya. This one comes from the German Justice Minister Herta Daeubler-Gmelin. Commenting on her claim that Bush is using war as a diversion from domestic issues, she said that it was something that Hitler would do. Bush took this to heart. He came back with no response and keeps the phone off the hook, on Germany; the common reaction of many past girlfriends of mine when I called them "Hitler."

The point for this round goes to nobody. Unless Bush goes to the German district of some American metropolitan area makes a speech full of loaded words about democracy and freedom and delivers it in broken German, he will forfeit his point to Daeuhler-Gmelin. I cannot give this point to her because she was, like Wilson, off sides. So the point to Duhya is pending. This calls for a tiebreaker. And now, it's my turn.

First off, as far as I'm concerned, Hitler had a more agitated time in office, and we all know that he wasn't that bad of a speech writer. Bush, on the other hand, is the Milli Vanilli of modern politics, and girl, you know that's true. Enough said on that. If you think that Bush actually wrote those speeches himself, then this column doesn't apply to you, considering that you are most likely illiterate.

There's a difference between how these guys took power too. One of them won power with force, and the other won it in a lawsuit. Any questions? No? Good. Moving on...

Fashion, fashion, fashion. Hitler had it and Bush doesn't. Dictators always manage to have a sense of style with them, I guess. I think that if Hitler had put aside politics and went into fashion design he'd be better off. I would have gone to my Senior Prom in an Adolf Hitler designer tuxedo or I'd be chasing some hot freshman girls in their Adolf Hitler halter-tops. Or better yet, one of those lucky women would get to see me in my Adolf Hitler boxer shorts.

Now, in comparing Bush and Hitler, I will end the fashion issue with this: If I had ever come across a picture of Hitler, dressed like a cowboy, with a Swastika on an oversized belt buckle, I would think long and hard on whether or not the Holocaust really happened. You can't rape, pillage, and exterminate so many people, while your disciples see you looking like you're from the cast of "Hee Haw." As a dictator, you got to have an image. Hitler wouldn't be caught dead in a pickup truck... but a bunker? Well, that's another story... that was a joke.

Now there is also the distinction of what a Christian Conservative would do in the presence of a homosexual, as compared to a Fascist. A Fascist, at least in today's terms, would most likely call up a few of his Fascist friends and try to make an assault on the person, and then run away quickly as to avoid the true outcome of his or her shallow political statement: a hairy cellmate named Bronto. Hitler would have sent gays to the furnace. Am I wrong?

However, Bush knows that you can't go around, trying to exterminate people that you think God doesn't approve of, even though you claim that he created them anyway. Killing so many people would not get the votes he needs. Florida was a pivotal scene and Miami is full of people with alternative lifestyles... very alternative lifestyles. So, the worst that you could expect out of the likes of Bush is a photo opportunity, a handshake, and then it's off to the bathroom to wash his hands with very hot water.

So I hope you all feel comfortable with my debunking of the notion that Bush may be a German dictator. He isn't German, that's for sure. Even if I don't exactly see eye-to-eye on many issues in the political or intellectual realm of Fascist Philosophy, Bush is, in my medical opinion, flawed in the 3rd quadrant of his brain, which is essential to being a Hitler or an effective president.

In conclusion, I would just like to press that Hitler's vision was violently ejected out the back of his head, and collected with a dustpan. Racism and corrupt politics are rampant, but fascism, in the sense of Hitler, is pretty much over. It's about time the media, and politicians move on to more pressing issues (third world developmental and, domestic economics and health care, hint, hint.), rather than gorging ourselves with cheap, political table-scraps of the 1940's. Thank you for your time. You may now proceed with your well-fed, white, suburban Melives.

Life scars to remember

JAMIE LOO

Everybody has had at least one physical scar in their life, temporary or permanent.

It could be that patch of skin on your elbow that just never healed because you fell on the pavement at the playground. Or that small line on the corner of your mouth because the stitches never healed when you got hit with that hockey puck. Maybe it's that bump hidden behind your bangs, when you slipped in the kitchen and hit your head on the sink at the age of 2. Even temporary scars, like when you burned the corner of your hand on the grill roasting marshmallows that summer at camp are remembered.

The ones that never go away are always particularly important, because they remind of you of that one incident, that one moment in your life. Sometimes it's a funny memory, like that time you fell over that little wall on the miniature golf course and got that double-lined scar on your ankle. Or it's a really scary memory like roller-blading into a lamppost and splitting your lip open.

I have a scar that I got three years ago this past weekend. I try to look on this anniversary, every year with a sensible measure of seriousness and a dash of good humor. It's really the only way to approach what happened, that summer after my senior year of high school, which changed my life. It was supposed to be a routine check-up before I went to school, but it didn't turn out that way. My doctor found a pea-sized lump on one of my breasts. I don't think I've ever been so scared before in my life. I obviously wasn't expecting anything like this. Being so young, seventeen turning eighteen in August, my doctor assumed it might just be an abnormality, nothing urgent.

She recommended me to a breast specialist, but he was booked for the summer so I couldn't see him until September 3—the day before I was supposed to move into UMass and begin college. This meant waiting for three months to find out exactly what was wrong. I spent the first few days after hearing this news thinking about my life and the thing in my chest that was possibly growing, ominously waiting to ruin my life.

I finally made a personal pact with myself: I wasn't going to let it ruin my summer. As my humanities teacher used to always say, "Carpe diem," seize the day. If it was going to be the last summer of my life I was going to live it up and have no regrets. I only told a few of my close friends—it didn't make sense to alarm everyone of something I wasn't even sure of yet, and I didn't want to spend the entire summer depressed of what-may-be. My eighteenth birthday was bittersweet, only because I wasn't sure if I would live to turn nineteen.

When I went to the specialist in September, what he found was a benign tumor. "Fibroadenoma," he said, "not uncommon for young women." I could barely pronounce it, let alone spell it. The important thing was, is that it wasn't cancer. Either way I had to have it removed, "just in case." As my doctor explained, "just in case," to my parents, my head was swimming with happiness, confusion and depression all at once. I wanted to know more about this thing, this fibroadenoma, so I went to the Boston Public Library right after my appointment. Three words still stick out in my mind: "studies are inconclusive." I remembered photocopying that page and putting it in my backpack. Those three words still sting, three years later. It's still unclear how they are formed or if they increase your chances for breast cancer in the future. Strangely, they tend to occur more frequently in women under the age of 25. I had my surgery on the last Friday of September 1999, and haven't found anything since. The timing was almost perfect, because October is breast cancer awareness month. Still wearing the bandage from my surgery I made dozens of pink ribbons to help raise awareness about this disease. I repeat this ritual annually to remember the blessing I have of being alive and to remember that this struggle isn't over.

> "Three words still stick out in my mind: 'studies are inconclusive'"

The American Cancer Society estimates that approximately 182,000 women will be diagnosed with breast cancer this year and approximately 43,300 will die of it. It's the second leading cause of cancer death. Until studies are "conclusive," people all over the world will be waiting for a cure. They'll be making pink ribbons to remember, celebrating the milestones in their fight against cancer, waiting for scientists to understand fibroadenomas, remembering the loved ones they lost. When I wake up every morning to get dressed it's tough to ignore the inch-long scar. It's starting to fade away, like the doctor said it would, but even when it's gone I pray that I'll never forget it was there. It's a life scar, that has become a sign of life to me. A constant reminder of that summer, of that pact I made to live my life every day like it's my last and to try to live with no regrets.

I almost forgot to celebrate this anniversary. Friday night, I went to a dinner and movie with some new friends I had recently met. Afterward I went to Charlie's with Melissa and Lizzy where we talked for hours. I was reluctant to go out Saturday night because I had a ton of homework to do but decided it could wait a little while. I picked up some more of my friends and went to a party in Rolling Green. After the party we had to drop Johnny off in Florence. It was a beautiful night. We drove up Route 9, with the windows rolled down, and the radio turned up. Everyone in my car was singing along to the music. At some point on this trip it hit me that it was the anniversary. I felt slightly ashamed of myself for forgetting, and then I realized that I didn't forget. This was a part of what it's all about. Hanging out, driving with your friends, singing like no one else is in the car. Living it up and seizing the day, "just in case."

To the Editor:

After working two weeks as a Security Receptionist in a variety of Southwest buildings, I have come to the conclusion that the entire UMass security system is 100 percent ineffective.

Every student living on campus has, at some point, scammed their way through the almighty security blockade (a.k.a. the little desk in front of the entrance to every dorm). It takes time to find one's ID or to sign friends into the building, and many decide that they do not want to nor have to take this time. While I'm working, many students will walk directly past me refusing to show me their ID. In this case, I am told to exclaim,

"Stop or I'll call the police." Student's have then replied, "Oh yeah? And what are they going to do about it? Even if they do come you don't even know who I am." The irony of this situation is that they are completely correct.

The security desk is worked every night in every dorm to present a façade, however, nothing is enforced. In reality, thousands of dollars are spent by the University each night on paying the security receptionists and supervisors to basically stage a system of security that does not exist.

In addition, money is spent on alarming the back doors (fire doors) of all the dorms but again, what is the point of this? They are meant to scare people from entering or exiting the back doors by creating a horrendous noise.

However, people have realized that it is only noise and it is easy to avoid getting caught! Again, this is money wasted to create a façade.

Moreover, even these ridiculous façades are not 24/7 and any person has easy access to all the dorms all day long or when the receptionists leave for the night. A recent article in The Collegian reported that UMass plans to invest millions of dollars in a security system around campus that again sounds completely pointless. Students will have to pay $75-$95 to be "a member" of this security club where they can press a key chain button when in distress.

But it will take seconds to be robbed or assaulted and minutes before help will come. The dorms should be the number one priority and many students are frightened to even leave their rooms at night to go to the bathroom. Crime should be prevented because it may be too late to fix something when it occurs.

The entire system has to be re-evaluated because the students are in danger. It is difficult to open one's eyes to what is really going on in the dorms because it is a frightening reality. Parents and students pay a lot of money for a secure housing environment that is not present. There have been numerous rapes, robberies, guns, stabbings, etc. in several UMass dorms that could have been prevented if the university would realize and do something about non-existent security.

To the Editor:

A small Native American community in central New York lives under a dictator. I think this is a very important thing for people to learn more about because it is our government that supports this dictator. Tonight, Danielle Schenandoah will talk here at UMass about the injustices her people face— while supporters camp out in her house to prevent the illegitimate tribal government from tearing it down.

The Oneida of New York, a Native American nation recognized by the federal government, may effectively lose their tiny remaining land base due to the actions of a 'leader' they oppose. I believe strongly that we at UMass can and should help stop this attack on their traditional life — if for no other reason because it is closer to us, more within our ability to control, and more clearly a matter of right and wrong than most issues we read and hear about. The best way to understand what the Oneida people are fighting for and how you can help is to come down to the Campus Center Auditorium at 7 p.m. and listen to a woman who is central in the struggle.

The people of the Oneida Nation of New York once selected Ray Halbritter to be one of three leaders. Shortly after the deaths of his co-leaders, Halbritter used nation authority to make deals with the state of New York and outside investors to build a casino— without the knowledge, let alone consent, of the community. In response, the Oneida and the Iroquois Confederacy, of which the Oneida are a part, formally removed Halbritter from power. The U.S. Bureau of Indian Affairs initially accepted the will of the Oneida people, but after one day it reversed itself and ruled that Halbritter remain the representative of the Oneida Nation of New York. This reversal came after pressure on the Bureau from a congressman to whom Halbritter had given campaign money.

This support of the United States government has enabled Halbritter to wield dictatorial powers for a decade. After a march in 1995 that challenged his rule, Halbritter stripped the many participants of their tribal status and benefits. He permanently locked up the nation's community building. He has established an 80-member, all non-native security force and a new court system for the Oneida nation, also staffed with non-natives. Both are funded with casino money and both are under Halbritter's control.

Of the most immediate importance, Halbritter has created new laws and used them to condemn and then knock down nearly half of the 20 homes on the 32-acre nation. Danielle Schenandoah has refused to obey a tribal court eviction requiring that she and her three children leave their home. I think we're very lucky to have a person with her courage and convictions speaking here tonight.

ARTS & LIVING STUDENT BUSINESSES

GreenO Subshop, Sweets & More... and more, and more...

Students run the show

By Kathleen Dacey
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

The University of Massachusetts has an unappreciated resource at its fingertips. Student businesses provide numerous services to those living and/or working across campus. Such organizations also provide a learning community for its members by giving undergraduate students the opportunity to achieve a co-curricular education in the cooperative management of a small business.

Though each one runs independently, all student businesses on campus are structured in a similar manner, organized into committees that include hiring, training, handbook, bookkeeping, payroll, cash-out, purchasing, advertising and inventory that each regulate a particular aspect of the trade. A core group steers the organization's direction, keeping them on track, and is composed of one coordinator from each of the committees.

The businesses keep in close contact with one another through the Board of Student Businesses (BOB). Two representatives from each business attend weekly BOB meetings in order to strengthen the link between the individual retail groups, the Center for Student Businesses and the rest of the University community. BOB members deal with current issues concerning businesses in relation to the University and the Student Government Association. One recent notable accomplishment through BOB, for example, was obtaining UCard machines for student businesses on campus.

Lying behind their official structures and general mission statements, though, an often unexplored, bustling world of commerce and comradeship exists within these organizations. Unexplored, that is, until now...

Campus Design and Copy (CD&C) is located on the second floor of the Student Union. To get there, one must pass a row of bright yellow lockers and a colorful bulletin board that proclaims their name. The atmosphere of CD&C is fast-paced. All the employees are busy photocopying, on the computer or in the back chatting with each other. They're a friendly group who are willing to re-copy anything that does not come out perfect the first time, even if it's just a dark little smudge on the corner of a page.

Courtney Miller, who's worked at CD&C for a year, said the organization has "one of the most diverse crews and clientele" of all the businesses on campus because of their central location and that "everyone needs to make copies."

Everyone in the group currently working at CD&C is a good friend to each other, often hanging out outside of work, Miller explained. Since they're understaffed, the work is a bit tense now as they try to hire new workers. Also she said the employees "never get into disputes" due to their amity with one another.

Sylvan Snack Bar is located in the basement of the Machmer building in the Sylvan residential area and at first may prove somewhat difficult to find. First one must sign in at the desk, and then head straight, take a right, go down a flight of stairs, pass the game room and follow the sounds and smells of a snack bar.

Once there one will find a room of delectable treats, with a diverse menu with simple subs, bagels, quesadillas and deserts all under $5.50. As Tony Kim, a senior who has worked at the snack bar for seven semesters, describes it, "it's a great place to come down between studying."

Sweet business served up

COLLEGIAN STAFF

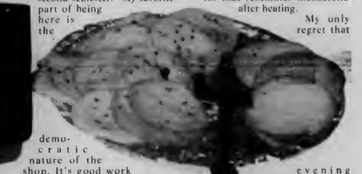
So it's 8 p.m., the D.C.'s are closed, delivery takes forever and a day to arrive, and your stomach is growling like a horny pit-bull. What do you do do my friend... what do you do? Worry not, your salvation lies a short walk away and can be found within easy reach of your living area.

Student businesses have been around for ages, and it's high time they were given the coverage they deserve. Evening hours and affordable prices are just some of the ways your fellow classmates keep food in your stomach and money in your pockets. These co-op businesses are run by students, for students, and the responsibility of running your own business is every bit as cool as working with people you love.

GreenO, Central's major student run co-op, is a funky blend of everything college. Upon entering the building, I was greeted with the eclectic music stylings of Phish. The most striking painting, on one of the walls that are hand-decorated, is a sunset with incredible depth of color. Students walk about, every person tending to their own specific chore all the while creating an almost choreographed dance.

As for the labor aspect, the tension commonly found in a restaurant kitchen was hugely lacking. Smiles and laughter were instead prevalent, along with the occasional shout-out to alert students of their finished orders.

"It's fun working here," said second semester student, Bethanny. "You get to work with kids you like, and you're responsible for yourself. It's great that we can pull all this together. Minimizing waste and buying local goods, are some of the ways we try to be a responsible business."



The lack of an adult supervisor doesn't seem to bother anyone. Paul D. has also been working for his second semester. "My favorite part of being here is the democratic nature of the shop. It's good work experience too." He added, "If you haven't been here, you should check us out!"

With seating for more than two-dozen students, freshly baked desserts and made-to-order grinders, GreenO is no stranger to massive amounts of business. Rush hours begin around 6:30 p.m. and run until about 8 p.m. Much of the business rushes are dependent upon television programming for that night. An extra long episode of "Buffy" can delay the lines of people for longer periods of time.

Sandwich selections run the gamut from sprouts to steak, and the variety is endless. Student suggestions are highly recommended, and some of their most popular subs are posted vertically on one of the room's columns. The hugely famous Funk Monster was my choice of sub for the evening. According to the staff it's one of the more commonly ordered hoagies the shop offers.

The ten-inch grinder arrived on a super-fluffy and pillow-soft grinder bread. I was able to consume every bite and not suffer from the hideous clicking sound my jaw tends to make due to over-chewing. It was served with what appeared to be about six to eight ounces of breaded, white meat chicken.

Toppings were simple but well paired. Grilled mushrooms and tomatoes provided interesting flavor and a chewy mouthful. Mayo is the original condiment, but special orders are accepted. The best part was the lack of lettuce. If salad is what you want, order it separately because the hot chicken and fixings would only wilt the greens and make them both watery and slinty. One final coup de grace of the sandwich was the Munster cheese melted on top of the chicken. The mild-flavored cheese is beyond the traditional cheese selections of cheddar or American and has a stretch factor that resembles mozzarella after heating.

My only regret that evening was my own inability to sample more items from the menu – which, by the way, is being revamped and extended. So if you want some awesome dinner plans this evening, here's a game plan: hot sub, soft couch, your rump, and "Friends" (either your television friends or the ones in your real life).

One hallway and a flight of stairs away from my room, is all that separates me from a plethora of ice cream sundaes and pizza bagels. It's Sweets & More. Such temptation was one of the most thrilling experiences when I was a freshman; the unbelievable excitement has since

Behold the glory of the mysterious white protein block, formerly known as tofu. Yes, I promised a recipe for those who – by either force or moral choice – forego the consumption of meat, and here it is. This week, meat is sweet and sour tofu chow mein served over toasted almond pilaf. I further guarantee that no animal or animal by-products were used in any part of this preparation.

To be perfectly honest with you, I didn't want to eat this stuff. It isn't the idea of tofu that I dislike – in fact it's quite good when grilled or tossed in a deep fat fryer. I really think it was the fact that this dish is essential. Is healthy that made my skin crawl. And it's not we never experienced tofu before and shudder at the thought of tasting it, don't. It doesn't really have a taste, but the texture is reminiscent of scrambled eggs. I'm not sure that helps entice any meat eaters out there, but if you're looking for the cheapness of eggs without the unnecessary hassle of flavor, tofu my friend, is the way to go.

Begin by draining the water from a can of chow mein veggies and toss them into your ever-handy microwave safe bowl. Then, chop one brick of firm tofu, add to veggies and mix in a half a cup of pre-made sweet and sour sauce. Set this mixture aside, until your rice is done. Or, if carbs make you bloat like a deer tick in June, just heat for five minutes and eat.

The rice pilaf mixture I used contained orzo, a macaroni-type product that I assume, contains no eggs, unless I am much more naive than I thought. In any event microwave it any way you wish, the world will be no different without it. The result, most startling, however, leaves something to be desired. Rice from a box is bland, so far superior in flavor than those packaged and microwaved, the water/oil bath that turned out so bad I didn't even finish the leftovers. Granted, it may be a bit more difficult getting the "rice cooker in your home, but they're perfect for

1 package firm tofu
1 can chow mein veggies
1 can crispy chow mein noodles
1 sm. jar sweet and sour sauce
1 box microwave long grain or wild rice
1 Tbsp. Veggie oil
2 1/2 cups water

2 medium Macintosh apples
3/4 Cups white sugar
1 Tbsp. cinnamon
1/4 teaspoon nutmeg
1 bag soft baked sugar cookies

the little chow mein thingies, but it works especially well in this setting and they're meat free as well. Imagine it.

After you're done with this little gem of a dish, something sweet begins to sound pretty good. I got this recipe from one of the women from the D.C., and I'd never thought about it before, but the basic apple pie filling can be produced in the microwave, and it makes your dorm room smell awesome, too.

Remove the skin and core of two medium Macintosh apples and cut them into wedges. Sprinkle fifteen quarters of a cup of sugar on top and sprinkle with one tablespoon cinnamon and a quarter teaspoon of nutmeg. Coat the apples with the sweet-ness and microwave until the apples have lost their crunch and are soaking in their self-created glaze. Can't you without crust? Spoon the mixture over soft baked sugar cookies and microwave for a minute or two again.

That's it for this week's veggie filled, sometimes it's a hard thing to be vegan or vegetarian in a society that condones the consumption of animal flesh at every corner, but for all those who maintain this lifestyle, you go. Meatless proteins, from tofu dogs to "riblets" are making it easier to skip the extra serving of Babe at dinner. So if you're looking for something that won't leave you gut heavy, reach for tofu – the other white protein.

Ok Go's debut album a gem

By Justin Poirier
COLLEGIAN STAFF

OK GO
Ok Go

Ever have that album that you just can't seem to stop listening to? No matter what you're doing it seems to find its way into your CD player, and since you first heard it, the songs always seem to be stuck in your head? Well, Ok Go's self-titled debut is all that and more.

It's undeniable that the "retro" sound has been all the rage lately and record companies have a serious crush on any band that even comes close to resembling it. It's near impossible to look at any music magazine and not see The Strokes, The Hives, The White Stripes or some other "retro" band with a "The" prefix plastered all over the cover. Well Ok Go have the "retro" sound, that's for sure, but not only are they missing the trendy "The" moniker, but they also sound nothing like any of the aforementioned bands. What Ok Go sounds more like is the bastard child of Better than Ezra and the Kinks with Spaceboy and Queen for foster parents. While that may mean very little to you, I assure you it means they sound amazing.

Ok Go wears their inspirations on their sleeves without ever seeming like they've ripped anyone off. The album's first single and opener is a self-proclaimed "stadium anthem" meant to be played at sporting events, but it's just as suitable for blasting out of cars or dorm rooms. The sports tie-in is further exemplified by the stomp-clap percussion that begins and fills the song, a direct homage to Queen's "We Will Rock You" fan undeniable stadium favorite). The song boasts head-bobbing throughout, interweaving cheesy keyboards, power solos for bridges and a classic simple singalong chorus that trumpets "Hey! Get Get-Get over it," three times. Not too difficult to remember is it?

While some might fault their radio-friendly tunes or how quickly they seem willing to sell their songs to stadiums, this honesty is a great part of Ok Go's charm. Their real strength falls not just in this honesty however, but in lines like "aren't you such a catch/ what a prize/ got a body like a hatteleze/ love that perfect frown/ honest eyes/ we ought to buy you a Cadillac." It goes without say that the average radio friendly pop tune lacks this kind of lyrical prowess.

Ok Go have crafted an album that is absolutely laced with catchy pop hooks and is just plain fun to listen to.

The band may have that overused "retro" band sound, but everything else about Ok Go is unique. Ok Go's self-titled debut is not only okay, it's great

The band certainly also possessed both senses of irony and humor, as shown in their video for "Get Over It" which features a three-second pause mid-song for them to play ping-pong in slow motion. This however, never prevents their poppy songs from lacking feeling. Singer/songwriter Damian Kulash Jr. integrates beautiful tones with a light-hearted falsetto and often uses his breath to add feeling.

This is perhaps most evident on "There's a Fire," in which he intentionally stutters. The song echoes the band's Weezer-esque lack of pretension, as they look and sound like they really might not think they're "all that." "I never say quite what I mean/ And never mean quite what I say/ And how did that get out of me/ And what the hell did I mean to say?" In an era when the likes of Limp Bizkit, Kid Rock, and Eminem are all proclaiming themselves the gods of everything, it's refreshing to hear an artist admit he has very little clue what he's really doing and/or saying.

Intermixed with the upbeat tunes are some mellow songs where Ok Go shine just as much as they do on their uptempo singles. "1000 Miles an Hour" is a perfect 'get away from the world' theme song, which exclaims, "with a little bit of money we could buy us a car/ with a little luck we could get away from where we are/ let's get out of here," a rather relatable sentiment that is laid over a song that reminds me of hundreds but maintains its own identity delightfully. It's again in the uncommon lyrics where Ok Go succeeds most however, as Damian sings, "We'll drive, one thousand miles an hour/ We'll fly past wheat fields and water towers/ We'll go. We'll go and we'll go. Let's go." How can one help but smile and sing along?

This band has danced in and out of the limelight over the past year. They're currently on the College Television Network's "Backstage Pass," feature and their album closer "Bye, Bye, Baby" was used in the goodbye episode of last year's "The Real World: Chicago." Its infectious chorus spews, "It's not just that I'm selfish and scared/ It's not just that I'm so unprepared/ It's just you'd think I'd get over this, wouldn't you?" Well I don't want to get over Ok Go nor do I want to say goodbye to them anytime soon. Any line from anywhere on this album could be quoted to show just how clever and slick Damian's lyrics are.

Ok Go probably doesn't sound like anything else you generally listen to. But if you let that scare you off, you'll be missing out on one of the best albums of the year, and what is now one of my favorite albums ever. Give Ok Go a chance and odds are you'll never "Get Over It."

worn off, but the ice cream stand remains and thrives.

A more laid back atmosphere dominates this particular student business. The haunting melody of an unidentified CD hangs in the room like a veil. Soft lighting bounces off the red walls and enhances the artistic feeling of the eating area. Everything about this business fosters a sense of creativity. Monthly special events have included an open mic night, which encourages students to share their talents – whether they are poetic or musical – in front of their peers.

In the few hours before the opening of Sweets, the most incredible smell of brownies and cookies invade your nasal cavity and inhabit your olfactory glands. Brownie and cookie sundaes are two of the most popular items, however it is the milkshake that's the king of this cold and creamy jungle. In the forty minutes I was down at the shop, several requests were made for the chilly beverages.

The most striking feature on the menu, however, is the price range. The cheapest and healthiest items are apple wedges with your choice of caramel, cinnamon sugar, or peanut butter for 75 cents and coffee at 50 cents a cup. No one item will cost you more than a finsky, a ring that is the most expensive item at four dollars a pop.

"One of our goals here is to keep things affordable for the students, we've had to raise and lower prices over the years, but we always keep the student budget in mind," said Chris, a fourth semester worker.

Busy hours are later here and 9 and 10 p.m. are peak hours for business, although they too vary depending on the nighttime television line-up. Seating for a baker's dozen is located within the shop, and table/chair combos are located outside the shop in the dorm lobby.

Snow's Ice Cream is the family owned local business, which supplies Sweet's with their homemade, famous frozen selections. The establishment is run out of Greenfield and is also the maker of the well-known Bart's ice cream. As a side note, the cream content of the ice cream (although an exact percent couldn't be located) must be pretty high, due to its smooth, thick texture.

This season's work has been increasingly profitable for the business. "We're saving up for big capitol purchases to better the business, things like refrigerators and ice cream freezers," the sixth semester worker, Addie told me.

Seven people work on the staff to date. The eighth person involved is a consultant who keeps track of money matters such as income statements and funds for purchasing items. These consultants are student business leaders who are mostly from the Isenberg School of Management.

One of the most amazing sights is out of view from the patrons. Murphy and Morrison, two former workers were reportedly part of the motion to turn the businesses away from managerial operation and into the co-ops we have today. In tribute, their aprons hang encased behind glass on the walls of the kitchen area.

Flavors vary over the course of the semester; Bing Cherry Jubilee, for example, is this week's wacky flavor. Standbys like chocolate and vanilla are kept year round for those who desire more traditional sundaes. My selection that night was the aforementioned Bing Jubilee and I was not disappointed. Generous amounts of fresh cherries were buried in the cool depths of the ice cream, and the cherry flavored base wasn't overpowering.

In the end, I was amazed not only at the level of satisfaction these students received while at work, but also at the quality of service and food they provided. It's a rare thing but awesome thing to see people psyched about doing their jobs, and these students deserve piles of support for sticking together whenever major problems pose a threat to their business.

The snack bar is designed to look like a pizzeria with booths and a checkered floor. He said that the co-managers are a "pretty tight group" who hang out together frequently. According to Kim, the only disputes the group has occur due to typical work stress and are quickly and easily resolved.

The biggest obstacle the group has had to overcome so far, Kim continued, is the high turnover rate of the staff at the end of each semester. The group has to rehire about half its staff at the beginning of each semester. (For reference, six new students were hired this semester alone.)

Peoples Market is located in the Student Union directly to the right after you walk in off the Hippie Bench (the steps to the left of the Union). Everyone recognizes the tree logo that represents the Market. It's on T-shirts and coffee cups littering the campus. The Market provides students with a variety of vegetarian food, but specialize in bagels and coffee. According to Devun Danchine-Curtis, a junior who has worked at the Market for a year, "The Market won't sell anything that causes suffering." This includes anything on the Boycott List, a list of companies that have unethical business practices.

Danchine-Curtis the people that work at the Market are "straight up cool kids" who she describes as "friendly, upbeat and nice." According to her the group is pretty close. Of the clientele she said, "The clientele are mostly 'nuppies' (or hippies of the millennium) TA's, and Professors." The biggest obstacle the group has faced so far has been starting up the store with a really low staff. Danchise Curtis said, "Starting up the store when I was the only person on extensions (who provide catering services) was hard because I did an entire catering job by myself." The goods at the Market are cheaper than Bread and Circus, even though they sell a lot of the same products.

Tix Unlimited is located in the Student Union across from the Five Colleges Union. The office is small and intimate, but just the right size for their small staff of seven. To buy tickets a student must peer through a wooden window and deal with one of the pleasant managers inside. Tix provides students with access to concerts and events on and off campus. In the past Tix has sold tickets to a variety of musical performances including Dar Williams, Sugar Ray, Wu-Tang, Moby, and O.A.R.

Kara Nostrand, a senior who has worked at Tix for five semesters, said that the location of the business makes Tix a high-energy place to work. The comanagers are "really tight" because it is such a small group. Of the small staff Kara said, "We try to challenge each other." Tix is the only student run business that is budgeted through the Student Government Association. Kara said that the biggest problem the business has faced recently is trying to get a decent budget from the SGA, who have cut their funding due to campus-wide budget cuts. Tix is the only student-run business that is funded by the SGA.

Earthfoods Café is also located in the Student Union. A bulletin board just outside the door alerts a hungry student what's on the menu for the day. The first thing a hungry customer will notice is the appetizing smell of freshly cooked food paired with the cha-ching of the register. The interior of Earthfoods is designed like a cafeteria with fond on a buffet-like display and plenty of seating. The cafe at noon on a weekday is full of activity with workers serving food, or in the kitchen preparing for the next day, or at the register ringing people in. They keep in constant communication through a simple walky-talky system. Long after finishing their dishes, the clientele hang out in the cafe to talk, play chess and study.

The mission of the cafe is to provide the UMass community with ovo-lacto vegetarian and vegan food at an inexpensive price. The cafe generally serves 1-2 entrees, salad, soup, and desserts. The food is wheeled in from the kitchen and set up daily. Recently the co-managers have succeeded in getting all biodegradable dishes and utensils. The co-operative is constantly striving to be more conscious about the environment.

Karen Tassinari, a junior who has worked at the cafe for three semesters, said that the co-managers are close and hang out together. She described the clientele as "happy, hungry, socially conscious people." The biggest obstacle for her in working at such a demanding job is to balance school and work and not get overwhelmed by the responsibility. She also said that one problem the cafe has had to face in the past is to "find dedicated people to work and also to not let those dedicated people burn out."

The Bike Co-op is a fun place to stop in even if it's just to meet the chatty, entertaining workers. The Co-op is located in the Student Union across from the Five Colleges Credit Union — a prime location for hikers who might be passing through the union or stopping in at one of the other student run businesses. The shop is easy to find, if you can't hear the music from the hallway or smell the rubber of the wheels, just look for bike parts on the door that clearly spell out "Co-op".

According to Justin, who's worked at the Co-op for a year the shop's major purpose is "To fix bikes and make money." He continued, "We aren't your traditional change your world co-op. We're just all about bikes." The shop offers several in stock bike parts and accessories and can order anything (aside from whole bikes) your cycle may need. Dave, another co-manager who's been at the shop for three semesters, said that, "Not enough people know we're a full service bike shop." Another obstacle he claimed the shop has dealt with was, "not being able to put a jump in the Cape Cod Lounge." The comanagers present all agreed that this would bring in many customers.

Services advertised on the website include a tune-up for $25, a flat tire change for $8, and adjustments starting at $5. Just watch out if you do drop in — as I was leaving they commented on my cheaply made shoulder bag and tried to sell me a custom-made Timbuk bag, even whipping out a booklet complete with fabrics to convince me. I didn't buy it this time, but when my bag breaks I know where to go.

been defensive backs Ramon Richeson and Deashawn Goddard, who rank first (37) and fourth (30) in tackles on the team, respectively. With that much talent and speed on the field, Whipple recognizes that protecting left Krohn could be an issue.

Richmond is almost as fast as North Carolina State and they'll play harder," he said.

Offensive success against the Spiders will rest mostly on the shoulders of quarterback Jeff Krohn, who has struggled at times mainly due to the fact that he has wound up on his back at the end of plays upwards of 40 times over the past two games. Still, six interceptions in two games is not what was expected from last year's Pac-10 leader in passing efficiency.

"Two of his worst throws, one against AIC and one against Northeastern – weren't intercepted. The other ones – [Kurt Abrams] at Northeastern made a great play and [Krohn] got hit on all the other interceptions."

The three-pronged UMass running attack has seen some success, even last week against the Wolfpack. R.J. Cobbs had 78 yards on 13 carries and Raunny Rosario picked up 58 on his 10 touches. Jason Peebler caught two passes out of the backfield, including a 50-yard touchdown grab.

"Jason does some good things with some certain run plays," Whipple said. "Raunny had a good game. So we'll play all three of them. We know that our tailbacks are going to get better. They made people miss at N.C. State."

But for all the offense's success, the Maroon and White has struggled to punch the ball home when it gets close to paydirt.

"If we don't score in the red zone, I think we'll have problems," Whipple said. "We've got to get the ball in the end zone. What's hurt us is losing yards in there. So that's a concern."

For the Minutemen, the answer to winning is simple, according to Whipple.

"We have talent, and if we concentrate, focus and play hard then we can be a good football team."

Senior Tim Tucker-Adrian (#39) in the Locker Room in the Atlantic 10 in tackles per game with 11.3. Richmond is ninth in the conference in total defense.

ond set 7-6 and as Price said, "[Russell] won two games in a row, found some energy and began to believe she could do it, the whole game changed."

Russell went on to take the decisive third set 6-4.

In the third singles match Jana Bartoloni was defeated by the Huskies Jennifer LoRusso in straight sets 6-0, 6-1 and UConn won the point they needed to take victory in the fourth singles match when Camilla Knight was defeated in three sets 4-6, 6-4, 6-2 by UConn's Barbara Schumsky.

It was again left to team captain Susan Hyams to put points on the board and give the match some respectability. Hyams did not disappoint and won her singles match 7-6, 6-2 against April Dixon to make the score 4-2. That was to be the last point the Minutewomen won, however, as in the sixth and final singles match, Dorothy Iwanowicz was defeated 6-4, 6-4 by Colleen Connors to make the final score 5-2 UConn.

The Minutewomen must now put this defeat behind them and get it out of their system as they face Marist College on Friday afternoon. With home court advantage, they must surely be hoping to improve their record to 2-1. However, Marist has been in impressive form so far this season, winning their two opening games and only losing one match point in the process.

Firstly, on Sept. 29, they shut out Rider Broncs 7-0 dropping only 10 games in the entire match. Yesterday, in a slightly tougher match, they defeated Monmouth by 6-1. Standout performers for Marist so far are sophomore Amanda Doctsch, who has only dropped one game in four sets of dual match play thus far, and freshman Yana Krugly, who has also dropped three games in her two dual matches so far.

After Friday's match up UMass' next match is on Saturday Oct. 12 when they take on St. John's in Jamaica, N.Y. This will be the last matchup for the Minutewomen before they travel to Cambridge, Mass. for the five-day ITA Regional Championships, which run from Friday Oct. 25 to Tuesday Oct. 29.

UMass BRIEFS:

Men's basketball

University of Massachusetts Athletic Director Ian McCaw announced Monday that men's basketball coach Steve Lappas has been rewarded with a one-year contract extension. Lappas, beginning his second season as the Minuteman bench boss when practice opens Oct. 12, is now signed through the 2006-07 season.

The Minutemen raced to a 4-0 start in Lappas' rookie campaign, highlighted by wins over Oregon, a team that captured the Pac-10 title en route to an Elite Eight run, and at NCAA Tournament entrant North Carolina State. The fast start, the school's best since the 1995-96 season, allowed Lappas to become just the third rookie coach in school history, and the first since Johnny Orr in 1963-64, to open his Massachusetts career with a 4-0 record.

Despite the quick start, Lappas' first UMass season ended with a 13-16 record. His program, though, did produce 2002 Atlantic 10 Rookie of the Year Anthony Anderson, and his motion offense helped the Minutemen drain a school single season record 204, three-point field goals.

Hockey

The University of Massachusetts' ice hockey season officially gets underway on Friday night when the Minutemen will host St. Francis Xavier at 7:00 p.m. at the Mullins Center practice rink.

The exhibition game is a rematch of last year, which St. Francis Xavier won, 5-3. The X-Men jumped out to a 4-2 first-period lead thanks to three power-play goals. UMass got on the board in the opening period on goals by Matt Walsh and Thomas Pöck, but couldn't draw any closer.

The Minutemen are optimistic for improvement following last year's 8-24-2 record. Head Coach Don Cahoon returns 16 letterwinners, including six of the top eight scorers from a year ago. Greg Mauldin is back for his sophomore year after leading the Minutemen in scoring with 24 points (12 g, 12 a) last season. He is the first freshman to lead UMass in scoring since the 1993-94 season. Also back is senior co-captain Tim Turner, who needs just 28 points to become the sixth player in UMass history to score 100 points. In all, the Minutemen return 121 points, or 64.0 percent of the scoring, from last year.

we're going to do against Northeastern, against N.C. State, against Richmond."

But forget about getting off their on-the-road slump, this is the Minutemen's biggest game of the year because it is a very winnable game.

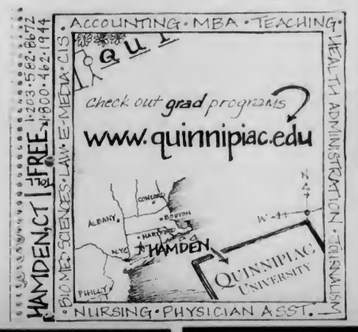
Richmond is 1-2 (1-0 A-10) after two tough losses to Division I Temple (34-7) and D I-AA power Furman (17-7). The Spiders only win came in a close 15-13 win over Delaware, one of the middle of the road teams in the A-10.

A team with a great defense and a conservative offense, if Richmond falls behind early against UMass, it would have a ton of trouble getting back into the game. If Whipple's high-powered offense can start the game strong, something that was a problem against Northeastern and N.C. State, the contest could be over in the first quarter.

Massachusetts needs the win to have a chance to build momentum heading into a tough homestand. It needs the win to snap its seven game road losing streak. And it needs the win because Richmond is a beatable A-10 opponent.

Coach Whipple isn't going to put Saturday's game ahead of any other in terms of importance; he doesn't approach the season or any game that way.

"We have to win the game, but we have to go into every game thinking we have to go win the game," Whipple said.



This is the most important game of the year for the Minutemen. Win, and next week is the most important. Lose, and next week may not really matter.

Atlantic 10 Men's Soccer Preview

Dayton
Last Season: 11-7-2 (8-1-1 A-10)
Current record: 4-3-1
Fresh new faces: Mpoki Tenende, Brennan Randquist
Strong Returns (last year's totals): F Sunday Isename (7 goals, 5 assists), F Chris Rolfe (5g, 8a), B/F Michael Nsien (8g, 1a)
The lowdown: Dayton enters the Atlantic 10 season with a few questions, but some interesting answers. The Flyers graduated eight players last year, including Wade Fischer, who played in every game of the season and submitted four goals and three assists, as well as Erik Nelson, who started every game for the Flyers, and chipped in two goals and five assists. While the midfield was decimated by graduation, leaving sophomore Tye Stebbens and junior Christian Porto as the only players to see significant time last season. Offensively, however, Dayton represents a threat to every team in the Atlantic 10. The Flyer attack is spearheaded by Rolfe, who earned A-10 Player of the Week honors for his work in Dayton's defeat of Michigan. The forward netted the Flyers' two goals en route to the victory, boosting his total to 8 on the season. Dayton starts it's A-10 season on the road at Rhode Island Friday, and continues on to Massachusetts on Sunday.

Duquesne
Last Season: 7-8-1 (4-7-0 A-10)
Current record: 5-1-2
Fresh new faces: M Pat Dillon, M/F Derek Freund, F Andrew Bell
Strong Returns: M/F Damien Pottinger (6g, 1a), F/M David Gingrich (5g, 3a), GK Terry McNelis (1.04 GAA)
The lowdown: Duquesne missed the Atlantic 10 tournament last year. That will probably be the last time you read that sentence for a while. The Dukes lost only two players to graduation last year, and return all 11 starters this season. They are off to a quick start, sitting on a 5-1-2 record as of press time, and are averaging two goals a game right now, with the scoring led by junior Damien Pottinger, who has five goals on the season. Junior Dan Haruna and sophomore Derek Mackenzie have contributed a combined seven assists to the effort, and a whopping 13 different players have at least one assist on the season. The Dukes may have bowed out early last year, but this year, they're a real contender. The Dukes open the Atlantic 10 season at St. Joseph's tomorrow, and host GW on Sunday.

Fordham
Last Season: 4-14-0 (3-8-0 A-10)
Current record: 3-4-0
Fresh new faces: F Mike Forenza, GK Thomas Mazzaro
Strong Returns: F Brian Borthello (9g, 4a), GK Nathaniel Freihaut (2.63 GAA)
The lowdown: Fordham is a bit of a mystery heading into the Atlantic 10 slate. The Rams split their pre-conference schedule, but didn't give any warning to the rest of the league this season. They gave Marist its first win, but also defeated Iona, which has improved in recent weeks. Borthello has chipped in 14 points on six goals and two assists in seven games this season. When Borthello is out, as was the case vs. Marist, the Rams falter. Freihaut is the other half of Fordham's one-two punch. His 2.00 GAA and .735 save percentage are underscored by his shutout of Manhattan, a 12-save effort for Freihaut's fourth career clean sheet. While the Rams may be missing a few pieces, scoring and goalkeeping could make them an exciting team to watch this season. Fordham opens the A-10 season against Temple tomorrow, and hosts St. Joseph's Sunday.

George Washington
Last Season: 9-7-0 (6-5-0 A-10)
Current record: 4-4-0
Fresh new faces: M/F Frank Ambrosio, GK Derek Biss
Strong Returns: F Matt Osborne (10g, 7a), MF Michael Goldman (2g, 7a), F Arnar Johannsson (10g, 2a)
The lowdown: The Colonials are another team that could go either way in the Atlantic 10. While they lost to teams like St. Francis and Towson, the latter of which was a four-goal shutout, they also beat Georgetown, and took perennial NCAA luminary Duke to two overtimes before surrendering the winning tally. Osbourne is the early scoring leader with 14 points (five goals, four assists). Johannsson has followed up nicely with six goals and an assist to his credit. The junior forward from Reykjavik, Iceland also earned A-10 Player of the Week honors on Sept. 3. All told, George Washington could be a force in the Atlantic 10, and is certainly a favorite to make the A-10 tournament in a month and a half. The Colonials open up the conference season with St. Bonaventure tomorrow, and travel to Duquesne Sunday.

La Salle
Last Season: 6-9-2 (4-6-1 A-10)
Current record: 1-5-1
Fresh new faces: F Dusan Vujovic, B/M Scott Golden
Strong Returns: F Bob Buonchristiano (5g, 6a), GK Stash Graham (1.73 GAA)
The lowdown: La Salle is a team looking to improve on a disappointing pre-conference season, which saw just one win, in its first game of the season against Drexel. After the win, the Explorers were over .500 for the first time in three years. After that, the best result La Salle could produce was a tie with George Mason. La Salle will be consistently struggling to find the back of the net, with only two multi-goal scorers and only two other players who have goals. Opponents who can put the ball in the net will find La Salle an easier win than most. Of course, that's assuming they can find their way past sophomore Stash Graham. Graham is the only goaltender in Division I to average eight saves per game, and has managed a 1.59 GAA to go along with his .842 save percentage. Graham will certainly keep the Explorers in many games this year, now it's up to the offense to produce the numbers that will push them over the top. La Salle opens the conference schedule against St. Joseph's tomorrow, followed by a matchup with Temple on Sunday.

Massachusetts
Last Season: 15-6-1
Current record: 4-4-0
Fresh new faces: B/M Jason Scudamore, B Tim Kitchell
Strong Returns: M/B Derek Rhodes (3g, 7a), F Jeff Deren (16g, 6a), F Ptah Myers (9g, 3a)
The lowdown: Massachusetts enters the A-10 season with something it never had before: The Atlantic 10 crown to defend. For the first time in school history, the Minutemen won the Atlantic 10 tournament, and advanced to the NCAA tournament, where it defeated Creighton to advance to the second round before losing to St. John's to end the season. Graduation took a toll on UMass, however, and many left players like seniors Rhodes, Deren, and Yuri Morales to take the lead reins on the Massachusetts bandwagon. After an exciting start, things started to fall apart for the Minutemen, as they only managed one more win in six games. During that span, UMass was blown away by MSU, edged by BU and UNH, and squeaked out a win over Iona. Since Sept. 21, however, things have been looking up, with a 4-1 defeat of Maine, followed by a six-goal shutout of Hartford. Look for Massachusetts to stay in the ranks of the A-10 elite. UMass opens the A-10 slate tomorrow against Xavier, and hosts Dayton on Sunday.

Rhode Island
Last Season: 13-4-1 (4-2-0 A-10)
Current record: 5-3-0
Fresh new faces: M Hans Esterhuizen, F Andy Boyle, M Anthony Ward-Smith
Strong Returns: M/F Peter Benevides (4g, 5a), GK Michael Charles (0.90 GAA)
The lowdown: Rhode Island's season began inauspiciously, with an 8-0 drubbing at the hands of No. 4 Maryland. Following that, the Rams held their own in a hard-fought battle with Virginia, the #9 the result was a 2-1 loss. Since then, the Rams have built around the play of Benevides, who was named Co-Player of the Week for the Atlantic 10 this week. The Rams went on a tear, winning five straight before dropping their last game to Brown Tuesday. Included in the streak was an upset victory over Boston University in Kingston. The 2-1 win proved that the Rams are for real, and will be attention-getters this season. They also shut out Providence and Quinnipiac, scoring a combined eight goals in the two games. Leading the charge for the Rams is Benevides, with six goals and two assists this season, as well as junior forward Perek Bellehi, who has netted four goals this season to go along with three helpers. The Rams open up with Dayton tomorrow at home, and take on Xavier on Sunday.

Richmond
Last Season: 13-6-2 (8-3-0 A-10)
Current record: 3-4-1
Fresh new faces: B Chris Lahoud, F Micah Fisher
Strong Returns: F Ken Holiday (8g, 3a), F Stephen Douglas (3g, 2a), M Tim Bozhichenko (1g, 2a)
The lowdown: Richmond comes into the Atlantic 10 with a resume that has become remarkable in recent weeks. The Spiders attack features an Atlantic 10 Co-Player of the Week in junior Buck Chris Zuk, as well as an A-10 Rookie of the week in Lahoud, who along with Fisher was named a "Freshman Making an Impact" by the College Soccer News. Freshman back Brian McDonald was also named a "Freshman to Watch." The Spiders certainly gave themselves a challenge in preparation for Atlantic 10 play, facing no less than three nationally ranked opponents, including No. 3 Stanford. Like many other A-10 teams, Richmond made a big splash early, when it beat No. 20 Penn State in its first game of the season 2-1 in overtime. The Spiders will open up the A-10 slate this weekend with games against wily Duquesne and St. Bonaventure.

St. Bonaventure
Last Season: 6-12-0 (2-9-0 A-10)
Current record: 3-2-0
Fresh new faces: M Andy Garcia
Strong Returns: M/F Johnny Phoumanny (2g, 4a), GK Mike Krupka (1.56 GAA)
The lowdown: It's possible that the St. Bonaventure men's soccer team would like the town of Olean to become a part of Canada. Head Coach Bill Brady is well on his way to making the squad a Canuck-fest. The roster boasts no less than six players from the great white north, including three from Scarborough alone. Garcia, from Mississauga, Ont., has become the early standout along with junior midfielder Gervin DuPorte, who tallied two goals in a 4-1 win over Cleveland State on Sept. 28. The Bonnies enter the Atlantic 10 season with one of the best records in the conference, but their relatively weak schedule leaves something to be desired. However, five wins still makes them one of the more successful teams heading into the A-10 slate, and they'll get their first test tomorrow when they take on George Washington, followed by Richmond on Sunday.

St. Joseph's
Last Season: 10-7-2 (4-5-2 A-10)
Current record: 6-2-0 (1-0 A-10)
Fresh new faces: F Mike Guglielmucci
Strong Returns: Andrew Kulinski (9g, 5a), Kevin Schmidt (2g, 4a), GK Kevin Dougher (1.45 GAA)
The lowdown: St. Joseph's has eight returning starters from last year's team, the first in school history to finish with a winning record. Remember that when you read the name of the top goal scorer on the team. Mike Guglielmucci currently has five goals in eight games, including three game-winners. The Hawks have the best record in the A-10, and got a jump-start on the rest of the conference with a 2-1 victory over Temple last Saturday. Thanks in part, certainly, to Guglielmucci, But don't forget those eight returning starters, who Head Coach Tom Turner calls "the most talented group of players I have had return during my tenure on Hawk Hill." Now, the Hawks will be looking for respect from the soccer world, something they feel was missing with the omission of graduated midfielder Ryan Dougherty from the All-Conference squad. Dougherty had 10 goals and six assists for St. Joe's last year. Look out for the Hawks to take their frustrations out on Atlantic 10 teams this season, and keep their perfect conference record, beginning with La Salle tomorrow, and continuing with Fordham on Sunday.

Temple
Last Season: 4-13-1 (3-8-0 A-10)
Current record: 3-6-0 (0-1 A-10)
Fresh new faces: D Joe Brocker, F Brian Laverdure, F Tony Donatelli
Strong Returns: F Steven Wacker (1g, 2a), GK Pat Hannigan (2.15 GAA)
The lowdown: This probably won't be the year for the Owls. Temple began its season with four losses before notching a win at Mount St. Mary's. Following that, the Owls won two more games, but haven't seen the win column since Sept. 21. They also dropped the first A-10 matchup of the year to St. Joe's, and will probably have trouble staying near .500 this year. However, the Owls have a bright future, embodied by the four freshmen in the top five scoring list for the team. Brocker has two goals and two assists this season, and should prove to be an exciting player as his career progresses. In net, the Owls have the steady Pat Hannigan, only a junior, who has posted a 1.72 GAA in 706 minutes in the cage. This young team will struggle this year, but look for them to become a power within the next few seasons. The Owls continue their Atlantic 10 slate against Fordham tomorrow, with another matchup at home against La Salle on Sunday.

Xavier
Last Season: 7-11-1 (3-6-0 A-10)
Current record: 5-3-0
Fresh new faces: F Andy Farrell, M Steven Barten
Strong Returns: Logan Wallace (5g, 1a), Charles Morgan (3g), GK Brian Schaeper (1.78 GAA)
The lowdown: Xavier may prove to be a wild card in the A-10 this year. While they missed the A-10 tournament last season, they finished in resilient fashion, including a shocking defeat of eventual A-10 Champs UMass in the last game of the regular season. Xavier returns just five of last year's starters, and head coach Jack Hermans told his crew before opening camp that all 11 starting spots were unoccupied. Year, however, the Owls have a bright future, embodied by the four freshmen in the top five scoring list for the team. Brocker has two goals and two assists this season, and should prove to be an exciting player as his career progresses. In net, the Owls have the steady Pat Hannigan, only a junior, who has posted a 1.72 GAA in 706 minutes in the cage. This young team will struggle this year, but look for them to become a power within the next few seasons. The Owls continue their Atlantic 10 slate against Fordham tomorrow, with another matchup at home against La Salle on Sunday.

Attack of the Spider-Men

UMass looks to get off road losing streak

By Matt Brads
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Two losses seems like nothing in a football season. In almost every sport a team is afforded a couple of hiccoughs within its season. But in college football, especially within a conference as tight as the Atlantic 10, two losses can have a team on the outside looking in.

The Massachusetts football team (2-2, 0-1 A-10) faces its biggest game of the season thus far as it travels to Richmond for a showdown with the Spiders (1-2, 1-0 A-10) Saturday at 3:00 p.m.

"Richmond is as good as anyone on our schedule besides North Carolina State," said Head Coach Mark Whipple, whose troops were obliterated in their season finale by the Spiders last year, 35-7. "We have to play really well to win this game and I think the first half is going to have a lot to do with it."

The Spiders sport one of the best defensive units in the conference as well as the nation, and playing catch up against them is much harder than protecting a lead, according to Whipple. The Minutemen will have to come out much more sharp than they did against N.C. State when they fell behind 28-7 in the early going.

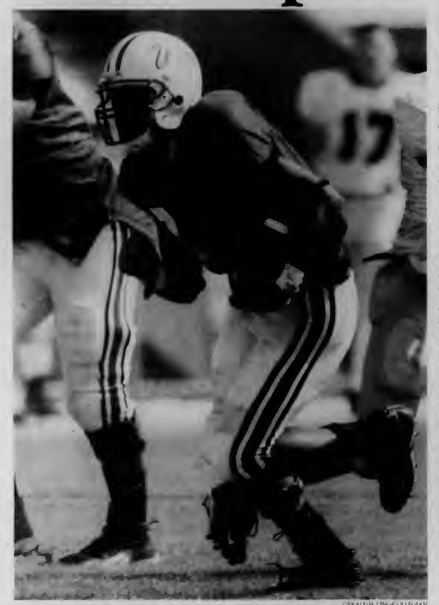
"We just want to win [this weekend]," Whipple said. "Last week we just wanted to play hard. This week is about finding a way to win the game. If we play well, then we'll win."

One of the biggest problems for the Minutemen will likely be the injury front. Offensive lineman O.J. McBride's injuries last week appears to be one that will keep him out for a long time. The long anticipated debut of Penn State transfer Terrence Glover will like ly be pushed back, as he tore his ACL Tuesday. Tight ends Sean Young and Mike Douglas have both been banged up, but both look probable for this week.

The loss of McBride could mean the second consecutive week of starting true freshman Jake Ward, who has plenty of size; at 6-foot-3, 296 pounds, but had no college experience before last week.

"Jake Ward is a freshman at left guard and he's seeing a 6-foot-4, 295 guy," Whipple said. "He didn't see anybody like that in Rutland, Vt., that's for sure."

But the biggest loss could be senior co-captain Corey Potter, who originally injured himself in last week's scrimmage and re-aggravated the injury at N.C. State.



"Corey's better," Whipple said. "If it hadn't been North Carolina State, he wouldn't have played last week. We basically played a game [last] Tuesday by scrimmaging, and that took a lot out of us for this week."

Whipple hopes that last week's trip to North Carolina will be a building block for a young Minuteman team that has very little travel experience.

"I hope the experience helps," he said. "We had some young guys go on that trip. It's hard to play on the road in this league and if you play well on the road, you're going to be a champion. We have to play better, it'll be an Atlantic 10 game, it'll come down to the fourth quarter."

The Richmond defense features two preseason First Team All A-10 selections in linebackers Adrian Archie and Mark Thompson. Also impressive for the Spiders have

Saturday's game biggest of 2002

When asked about the importance of Saturday's game at Richmond, Massachusetts Head Coach Mark Whipple responded, "that's for you guys to figure out."

Fine, then. This the biggest contest of the year for the Minutemen.

A loss this week would really hurt any chance the team has of winning the Atlantic 10 Championship and a win should get the team back on track after back-to-back losses to very tough opponents (Northeastern and North Carolina State).

In a conference lined with parity, it appears that the A-10 Champ will have to go 9-2 or 10-1. Since UMass fell to Northeastern two weeks ago, it has very little room for error in the eight remaining games, all in-conference, on its schedule.

No. 3 Maine and No. 11 Northeastern have to be considered the favorites, as both teams are undefeated and dominating their opposition.

Through four games, Northeastern is leading the conference in both points scored (37.2 points per game) and points against (8.5 ppg). The Husky's most impressive stat is their plus-10 turnover margin in just four games. Only one other team in the conference has a positive turnover margin (William and Mary plus-five).

Meanwhile, Maine has gotten a lot of credit due to a pair of big wins. Its week two 27-14 win over No. 17 William and Mary, followed by a 21-14 victory over No. 7 Villanova had all of Division I-AA at attention. Its continued dominance pushed Maine all the way to No. 3 in national polls.

With the tough Black Bears headed to Warren P. McGuirk Alumni Stadium next week, the Minutemen must get off the current two-game losing streak. Some confidence from a big win against a tough opponent would do the trick.

Also, to have any chance in the conference this year, the Minutemen must win on the road, something they have been unable to due since Nov. 11, 2000 at Rhode Island. Since that 29-21 win over URI, Coach Whipple's crew is 0-7 away from McGuirk. This cannot continue for the Maroon and White to have a chance at the postseason.

Just don't expect Coach Whipple to change anything about the trips just because his team has had a rough time on the road lately.

"We're going to do the same thing," Whipple said. "That was my approach at N.C. State. We did what

Women's tennis falls to UConn

By Nick Wright
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

The Massachusetts tennis team lost its first dual match of the season against UConn yesterday afternoon, 5-2, and dropped to 1-1 for the season.

UMass was up against it from the start with the Huskies winning the number one and number two flight doubles, to take the single point on offer from the doubles play. The Minutewomen's number one doubles pairing of rookies, freshman Camilla Knight and sophomore Sasha Edelstein, was beaten 8-5 by UConn's Barbara Schumsky and Trinell Russell, and UConn effectively rendered the third doubles rubber meaningless when its pairing of Colleen Connors and April Dixon defeated UMass' Stephanie Price (sophomore) and Dorothy Iwanowicz (freshman) 8-6.

The Maroon and White did salvage some pride however in the third and final doubles match up when junior Susan Hyams and freshman Jana Bartoloni followed up their doubles victory over Amherst college by defeating UConn's Simcik and Shea by 8-4.

This left the Minutewomen needing to win at least four of the six singles matches if they where to take the match – a task that was always sadly going to prove beyond them.

Things began well enough for the Maroon and White with Sasha Edelstein winning the number one flight singles, with a 6-2, 6-2 victory over Whitnes Simick. Edelstein had already beaten Simick once this season in the semifinals at Westpoint (6-4, 6-4) and was obviously delighted to win this time around as well. Edelstein said, "I played well, I controlled the game and attacked a lot as well."

Things were also looking good in the number two singles when Stephanie Price was playing UConn's Trina Russell. Like Edelstein, Price had previously defeated her opponent in a previous contest destroying her 6-0, 6-0. A similar result looked on the cards as Price dominated the first set winning 6-1. Russell though won a close sec-

Maroon and White senior forward Jeff Deren leads the team in scoring with 12 and goals with five

The Massachusetts men's soccer team will open conference play this weekend as Atlantic 10 rivals Xavier and Dayton visit Rudd Field for what has shaped up as an important weekend for Coach Sam Koch's squad. After coming out of the non-conference portion of their schedule even at 4-4, Coach Koch and his players understand the importance of getting off to a good start against the upper echelon teams of the league.

"This is a big weekend for us, and we have to be ready," Koch said. "The two teams are 9-1 combined [in their last 10 games] coming into the weekend, and they've been playing well, getting results. I think these are both teams that are in the A-10 playoff hunt, and they could definitely be there in the tournament, so it's important for us to do well against them now."

Xavier (5-3), winners of two in a row and five of its last six, visits Amherst this Friday with hopes of building off its emotional last-second win over Wisconsin on Sunday. With a high-powered, quick-strike offense that comes from all over the field, the Musketeers pose a threat across the board with their speed. Led by Atlantic-10 Rookie of the Week Andy Farrell and star sophomore defender Tiset Sondaal, it will be up to the UMass defense to keep points off the board and the game within reach.

"Xavier has two very good frontrunners, and an excellent attacking back [Sondaal]," Koch said. "So, we need to hold them off to be successful."

Another cog in the defensive machine that must play well for UMass to be successful is the goaltending. Coming off last weekend's impressive performance in which he posted a 6-0 shutout against Hartford, senior Enzo Altomare hopes to be tabbed the starter for this Friday's match up, but the revolving door in net continues to rotate. In what has become a three-man competition between Altomare, fellow senior Dave Doucette, and junior Colin Burns, a lot hinges on what has transpired during this past week of practice. The coaching staff has evaluated each keeper and will make a game time decision as to who gives the team the best chance to win.

"It's a very heated three-way battle," Koch said. "I'll have to talk to our goalkeeper coach to see how well they've been training."

In 4-3-1 Dayton, UMass will be facing a team that started the season slowly but has managed to turn it on as of late. The Flyers have won four in a row including a 2-0 shutout of Big 10 power Michigan in their last game and a 3-2 double OT thriller the previous week against Denver. They also boast the Atlantic 10 Co-Player of the Week in sophomore forward Chris Rolfe. Averaging more than a goal per game, Rolfe and the rest of the Flyers offense will again put the onus on the UMass defense to step up, and in doing so hopefully allow the offense to move the ball swiftly and consistently into the offensive zone.

"We have to move the ball quicker," Koch said. "Defensively, we have to work on marking up, and closing down our marks."

All in all, the team must play well in every aspect of the game for the full 90 minutes if they hope to start conference play on the right foot. There are plenty of bright spots for the Minutemen, including the play of Dinn Brothers/UMass Athlete of the Week Derek Rhodes, but they are faced with injuries in a few key spots as well. If the defense can step up in front of whichever keeper is in net and provide a spark for Rhodes and the offense, it may come down to the play of backups who are pressed into duty to determine the fate of the Minutemen.

Coach Koch remains cautiously optimistic.

"We have a few injuries, but I'm very confident in the second group, they've played well all week. I certainly hope we'll be ok."

Friday's game will kick off at 3:30 p.m. at Rudd Field, followed by Sunday's 1 p.m. contest, also at Rudd.

Oneida brings message to campus

By Scott Enright
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Danielle Schenandoh Patterson of the Oneida Wolf Clan spoke last night in Hasbrouck about her concern for the Haudenosaunee people to students and gathered community members at the University of Massachusetts.

Patterson represents the Six Nation Iroquois Haudenosaunee. Patterson explained that Iroquois meant "people of the long house."

"I am standing up for my human, civil, religious and constitutional rights...what I am going to bring today, is the truth," Patterson said prior to the event.

Dan Gulko, a recent biology graduate from UMass, briefly described his role as an organizer to the event.

"I met Danielle about two months ago at a Leonard Peltier rally...it started out as a way to open my eyes to a situation, but it really has changed my life."

Gulko gave a brief explanation of why he chose to be a part of the event before introducing Patterson to the crowd.

"It is time for me to reclaim what is being taken in my name. I am an American and I want to take responsibility for what is being done," he said.

Patterson described her situation. She is a Native American living in fear of losing her home. She is also being charged with assault on a police officer, and possibly faces a year of imprisonment.

A brief history of the Oneida people was shown on video format after Patterson began her presentation. The film shown was filmed and funded by the Oneida Nation.

Following the film, Patterson elaborated on the differing politics of the United States government and the Haudenosaunee.

"The USA sits as a pyramid... on top of the pyramid is the president, the people are on the bottom. In the Iroquois nation, the pyramid is flipped and the people are on the top. The chief is on the bottom," she said.

Patterson identified the Haudenosaunee as a sovereign nation separate from the United States.

She explained that due to the matriarchal system of the Iroquois the Clan Mother chooses the chief of a tribe, a lifetime position. The Clan Mother is the only member of the clan who can remove the chief from office.

According to Patterson, Ray Halbritter was chosen by the Clan Mother to be the Oneida Nation representative. Since his initiation into office, he has performed several acts that the Oneida people claim to be illegal.

The Clan Mother asked in 1993 that he be removed from office but the federal government allegedly refused to remove him.

Halbritter works with the Bureau of Indian Affairs and has set up a private police force to govern the Haudenosaunee.

Patterson claims that this goes against the Haudenosaunee's wishes and is against the will of the Clan Mother.

"A video says a thousand words," said Patterson, as she prepared the audience to see "documented proof" of Halbritter committing illegal acts with his police force.

She left the room as the video began to show what Halbritter calls a safety inspection.

The video shows police officials issuing Patterson a search warrant. Patterson claims that the warrant had no federal judge's signature. Officials continued to demand that she let them into her home, howev-

Poetry at Amherst College

By Lindsay Kirkham
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Poet and novelist April Bernard was the featured poet at Amherst College on Wednesday night, where she read excerpts of her most recent poetry. Bernard's visit kicked off Amherst College's Fall Reading Series that features both emerging and established authors.

Bernard, a Harvard graduate, taught poetry at Amherst College during the mid-1990s and published the novel Pirate Jenny, as well as three collections of poetry. The first poetry collection earned her the Walt Whitman Prize of the American Academy of Poets. Her other work includes literary essays and travel writing that have been featured in prominent national publications such as The New Yorker and Vanity Fair.

Addressing a crowd of approximately 50 people, Bernard shared a mix of her self-professed "disheveled sonnets." These included selections from her latest volume of poetry entitled Swan Electric, along with currently unreleased pieces.

Bernard touched on such themes from her poems as isolation and moral ambiguity, which, according to critics in a review at Norton Poets Online, "...combines sternness, sorrow, and flights of fancy, in her struggle to find moral footing as poet and human being."

She also shared the last section of poems in her newest book labeled Fidelica, the title of which comes from the Greek word for "hallucination." In this collection she envisions different encounters with characters ranging from Jimmy Stewart and William Blake to a crow and a swan.

When asked about her early experiences with writing, Bernard confessed that her first literary love was poetry. She informed the audience that she is working on a second novel based on an undisclosed idea she has been thinking about for twenty years. She also mentioned that constructing a narrative takes more of a conscious deliberation than poetry requires.

"Poems are a natural outgrowth of my thinking, being and living life," Bernard said.

Bernard said that with the help of a particularly influential professor as an undergraduate at Harvard, she came upon the realization that "there just wasn't anything higher to be done with life [than to create literature]." Bernard believes that this is true regardless of the literary genre.

The Fall Reading Series is an annual event coordinated by the Amherst College Creative Writing Center. The next performance is Oct. 16, featuring Pauline Melville, author of the novel The Ventriloquist's.

Annual Oozefest returns

The slogan, "Got mud? We do!" has been posted across campus, announcing the beginning of this year's mud volleyball tournament, Oozefest 2002. Sponsored by the Student Alumni Relations Society (STARS), thesecond annual tournament will take place on Saturday, Oct. 5, from 12 p.m. to 5 p.m. behind the Totman Gym.

This year's Oozefest will feature seven previously registered teams of between six to eight students. Close to 9,000 gallons of water will be poured onto the Totman sand volleyball courts, creating a pool of mud. Teams of students and alumni will compete in 15-minute volleyball grudge matches. The first team to reach 21 points will be declared the winner of the contest.

"Our goal is to have 16 teams total... [but] in my experience, most people wait until the very end to sign up," Keith Healey, vice president of STARS and this year's chairman said. It costs $15 per person to participate in the festivities. The coed tournament requires that there are at least two women per team.

Participants will receive a goodie bag containing a 2002 Oozefest T-shirt and pizza donated from Delano's. In addition, a prize will be awarded to the winning team.

During last year's games, approximately 250 people attended the event with nine teams participating.

"I love Oozefest. It's one of the only times when it's socially acceptable for me to wallow around in the mud," said Lucas Maloney, a junior theater major.

"It really is a fun time whether you're playing or not. Friends, fun, and mud – what can beat that," sophomore legal studies major Danielle Nizza explained.

Spectators are invited to stop by and watch the games, listen to music, and receive free samples of Coca-Cola.

"We really just want to provide the student body with a great opportunity to have some fun," Healy said.

Those interested in participating in the event can register at the STARS office located in Memorial Hall or call 577-1590 for more information. The final date to register by is Friday, Oct. 4.

Hanging around with Adam Duritz

By Matthew Despres

He has mourned for the past, celebrated the present, and famously shared his desire with the world to be Bob Dylan. Today, though, is a bit different. Adam Duritz is simply excited about tomorrow.

"I never write on the road, but to be honest, for the first time ever I feel like I can," says the lead singer of Counting Crows. "I've got all of these ideas."

Duritz and company, currently on the road supporting their latest studio album, Hard Candy, have just wrapped the first date of their fall tour in Providence, R. I. By all accounts, the opening date went off in typical rock fashion: "Oh, you know, somewhere between 'well' and 'a disaster,' " laughs the frontman. Settling into his tour bus (which stops in Amherst this Saturday evening, when the band performs at the Mullins Center), the singer is already contemplating the continued responsibility that comes with fronting one of rock's most visible outfits.

"I'm not really worried about [sales] and stuff like that in general," he says. "I mean, this is a business, and I'm a big part of the business that's being carried on here, but the real pressure is to make good albums; that's hard. The pressure is to play good shows; that's hard. Whether people are going to accept it or not, well, that doesn't have anything to do with me. I can't go out there into their living rooms and talk 'em into it."

September 30, 2002

To UMass Campus Community,

I am writing to clear concerns regarding the rally that took place on the stairs of the Student Union on September 18, 2002 and the distribution of a flyer that made disparaging remarks regarding various University officials.

I would like to make clear that the Flyer passed out at the rally was not produced by the Office of ALANA Affairs, nor reflects my personal views for addressing the issues affecting the ALANA community on campus. The views expressed in the flyer were neither endorsed nor supported by the Office of Alana Affairs, but were solely the views of the author(s) of the flyer.

The Office of ALANA Affairs' role on the September 18th 2002 rally was limited to helping students reserve the space in front of the Student Union. This was done because the Campus Activity Office policy does not permit individual students to reserve space without having signature authority. Our office has historically assisted students reserve space on campus to express their grievance on diversity and ALANA concerns. This has been done because the Freedom of speech clause of the First Amendment does not place limits on WHO can have free speech. The current policy for reserving the space in front of the Student Union limits it to those students or groups with signature authority. This is the reason our office booked the space for the students to have the rally. The rally was NOT planned, organized nor supervised by the Office of Alana Affairs since it was not one of our events.

The Office of Alana Affairs sincerely regrets any harm or confusion that may have resulted as result of this event.

Sincerely,

Nelson Acosta, Director
Office of ALANA Affairs

The Amherst Area Chamber of Commerce's "Welcome Students Day" winners this year were two University of Massachusetts students. The second annual Downtown Student's Day, sponsored by the Amherst Downtown Merchants under the Amherst Area Chamber of Commerce, was held on Sept. 18.

The two award recipients were Rohini Noronha, 24, a graduate student in public health, and Katie Van Der Kloot, a junior comparative literature major. Noronha won a $225 Off-Campus Meal Plan meal ticket and Van Der Kloot won a $500 shopping spree to be used within stores registered with the Downtown Merchants' group.

"I was very happy. I have not won anything before," Noronha said.

Approximately 50 downtown businesses featured free drinks, food and discounts to students at the event. Students from Amherst and Hampshire Colleges also participated.

The Amherst Area Chamber of Commerce intends to continue to hold the event annually.

"It's an attempt by the Amherst Downtown Merchants and the Amherst Area Chamber of Commerce to welcome students and have them as an integral part of the community," said Alfredo DiLascia, chairman of the Amherst Downtown Merchants.

The downtown businesses are committed to making this event more significant for the community with greater participation on the part of both students and businesses.

"We plan on building on this event, making it bigger and better," DiLascia said.

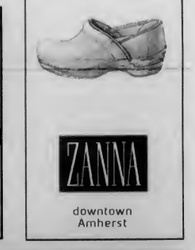
er, Patterson refused to allow them entry. Footage shows her pleading for them to stop as officers pry open her second door with a crowbar. At this point it appears that Patterson is punched in the head by an officer. A statement can be heard coming from somewhere in the video instructing an officer to "take her down." Patterson cries for them to stop pulling her hair, and repeatedly asks them to leave her alone.

Later, the video showed Patterson's bruised body. Patterson said that she was taken to the emergency room of a local hospital and that police officers refused to fill out a report.

At the conclusion of the video Patterson re-entered the room and posed a question to the audience.



"My question today to all human beings is how many more generations have to see this?"

Gulko and others chimed in and asked for participation from the audience.

"We really need to put pressure on the Bureau of Indian Affairs to stop this," Gulko said, to which Patterson added, "Our land is very sacred."

A question and answer period followed the presentation. Information was written on the chalkboard for anyone interested in getting involved.

UMass MinuteFAN Park:

A good beginning

It is fairly common knowledge that a new Chancellor took over control of the University this past summer with the hiring of John Lombardi. Though it's early on in the year, there is an air of optimism that changes for the better are going to transpire.

What may be less known, however, is that the Athletic Department also hired a new big cheese over the break. With the retirement of Bob Marcum, the reigns of UMass Athletics were handed over to Ian McCaw.

McCaw came to Amherst from Northeastern University in Boston. Though the Huskies and Minutemen share conferences for football and hockey, the majority of Northeastern's remaining sports play in the America East Conference, which, though a good little conference, is light years behind the Atlantic 10, of which UMass is a member.

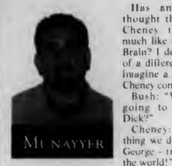
McCaw has stepped up a notch taking over as head of the Athletic Department and has a number of daunting challenges in front of him, not the least of which is the dismal student attendance at athletic events. Since the Calipari years, attendance at the Mullins Center for men's basketball has continued to decline, with football, hockey, women's basketball and the rest of the sports in a similar fate. It has been an awesome challenge to try to drive students back into the seats to support the Minutemen.

Next weekend though, the return of the students should begin. In the first of what will hopefully be many progressive and forward thinking plans by UMass Athletics, the department will unveil MinuteFAN Park at the next home football game versus Maine.

MinuteFAN Park will feature pre-game attractions for fans of all ages. There will be live music, food and drinks with dining facilities, as well as a Kid Zone. It will be located on the Dallas Lawn by Warren P. McGuirk Alumin Stadium. In the words of McCaw, taken from a press release, "In an effort to enhance the game-day experience for our fans, we believe MinuteFAN Park will have something for everyone."

Giving all fans a place to gather before the game is a smart move. A place for students to gather as well and get psyched up for the match is even better. MinuteFAN park admission will be free, but restricted to ticketholders. And remember that students have free entrance to football games, as long as they show their ID.

MinuteFAN Park will hopefully only be the beginning. In the modern world of sports entertainment, the game is only a piece of the whole package. This concept appears to be well understood by the new Athletic Administration. UMass fans can only hope for similar ventures at the Mullins Center during basketball and hockey season, as well as the many other sporting events that take place throughout the year.



Last Saturday, the football squad traveled down to Raleigh, N.C. to take on N.C. State. Even though this was a Division I-A team hosting a Division I-AA team in UMass, the Wolfpack faithful still turned out 51,000 strong. Though UMass would love that many fans at game in Amherst, it would probably settle for selling out McGuirk Stadium, requiring only 17,000.

MinuteFAN Park is not going to solve all of the Athletic Department's problems, but hey, it's a start.

The politification of war

Has any one else thought that Bush and Cheney together are much like Pinky and the Brain? I don't see much of a difference. Can one imagine a typical Bush-Cheney conversation?

Bush: "What are we going to do tonight, Dick?"

Cheney: "The same thing we do every night, George – try to take over the world!"

Bush: "Narf!"

I'm glad our president is getting the guidance he needs. Imagine if he was left to do this work alone.

Recently, however, I have been noticing a trend. Even though Bush is surrounded with experienced cabinet members like Cheney and Rummy, he hasn't said much about national policies. In fact this whole Iraq thing has dominated the headlines for too long.

The administration is working as hard as it can to keep things that way. Even Colin Powell is in on this one. He, along with other members of the state department, is usually balancing the hawkish part of the administration, but something has changed.

It's unfortunate that this is happening, but the Bush administration doesn't want to talk about anything else. With elections coming up there are other issues that should be discussed.

National issues have been ignored. Democrats in Congress are trying to talk about social welfare issues and the economy as well. Everyone understands the need for Homeland Security, that's why we have Tom Ridge (doesn't that make you feel safe).

Maybe another issue should be reforming information gathering agencies, like the CIA and FBI, and actually doing it right. How about discussing breeches on our freedoms that have occurred in the past year? And better yet, I wonder what our buddy in the oval office has to say about universities holding back pay from their employees? There are so many things that need to be talked about.

This year is a major election year that can make a big difference over the coming years. We have to be able to see past this cloak that is being left in front of our eyes. To be fair I also believe Democrats have not done enough to break this Iraq nonsense. Maybe it is because they genuinely feel that this is the most important issue going into elections. Or maybe they just do not want to be branded anti-American by their opponents. Either way, they are walking a thin line and need to let their constituents know that Iraq is not the only issue they are concerned about.

"In his own mind I'm sure he thinks of himself as a superhero..."

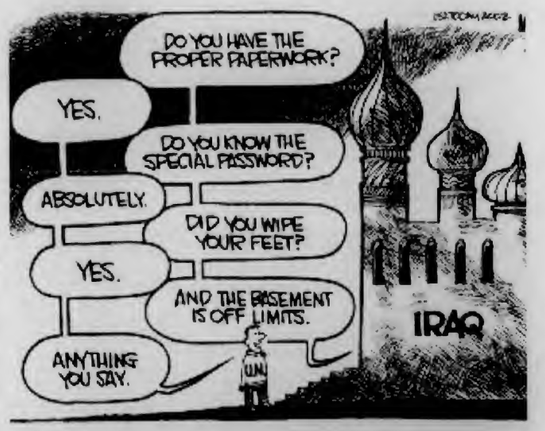
It has become such an issue that a few weeks ago President Bush replaced Osama bin Laden with Saddam Hussein as Public Enemy No. 1. This is the president who a year ago told us that fighting terrorism would be the object of his presidency. It seems to me that President Bush enjoys the high of wartime approval ratings.

Maybe when he is done with Iraq he will move next door and take out Khatemi. I'm sure we can vilify him into a dictator. We did it to Saddam (the leader of a nation that is much more liberal and secular than Saudi Arabia), so Khatemi shouldn't be a problem. It would be ironic though seeing as that Khatemi's election was much more legitimate then Bush's appointment by the Supreme Court.

And then if he finishes with Iran and his popularity is dying down because people are starting to realize that the economy is poor, education is poor, campaign finance reform is imperative, maybe then he will turn inward. Or he could just turn to North Korea and go for the trifecta. Hopefully someone will stop him before he screws everything up. The question is just how much will he screw up when people realize enough is enough?

Before Sept. 11, 2001 Bush didn't do very well. His foreign policy dealing with the Middle East and global agreements made him disliked in the world. His incompetent remarks did not help his image very much. Some of the things he says make me wonder what it's like to work for his public relations department – the suicide rate in that field must be very high. I'm sure they are trembling and praying every time he speaks extempore.

But since that fateful day in September a new image has been created for him. He was no longer President Bush the Incompetent or President Bush who can't figure out how to use a teleprompter, but he became President Bush the Lionhearted. He became the leader of a crusade. He has an entire people behind him. In his own mind I'm sure he thinks of himself as a superhero; maybe he has little Superman pajamas with cape and all.



It just seems to me that Bush and his administration were not ready to go back to the way it was. They like hunting down the "evildoers". And we should not fear that the "evildoers" are few. They are many, but if we run out we can always make up some more.

What I'm getting at is very simple. This war, this pre-emptive strike, this [insert euphemism here] is not about Saddam, it's not about weapons of mass destruction, not democracy, not combating evil. It's about President Bush's, his administration's and their party's need to have something they can claim to have done right.

Pinky, you let me down.

A different perspective

Reality hits like a ton of bricks. You don't remember exactly when you found out you weren't a playful child, with no bigger concerns than what flavor ice cream you wanted, but when you do, it is kind of sad. Maybe for some it is waking up on a snowy morning to get ready to go out into the bitter cold for work or class, when all you want to do is stay inside, your warm place in your sweatpants, watch some TV, and drink hot chocolate.

As you pass the little girls making snow angels or the little boys building their fort, you realize you are no longer a child and that those days are long gone. Other people may realize their lack of enthusiasm for certain little things that used to thrill them, such as swimming in the pool or building sand castles on the beach. Now you would rather just relax by lying on your towel in the sun and reading your magazine or taking a cat-nap.

Time goes by so quickly it is frightening. Most of us can look back and remember the days of our childhood. Life itself just falls into place. It happens all by itself, but we help carve the path with the decisions we make. Little decisions matter too, but we usually don't think as much about them as we do the big decisions. You don't sit down and plot out which highway you are going to take to get to work, the mall, or the party...you just do it.

If you choose one path over the other, on one you could get into traffic, or even an accident, and delay your day or change your life. Let's say you met your boyfriend or girlfriend at your job. You could have dreaded going to work before then, but if you hadn't worked there at all, then you wouldn't have met your significant other. It is strange to think about the what-ifs in life and you can talk about them for hours.

Bigger decisions are those like whether or not to go away to college, and once that is decided what school you want to attend. There are so many factors that come into play when you decide where you want to go to school, such as cost, size, and location. I remember thinking about all those things just a few years ago.

I recently read something for one of my classes called On Going to College. It was written by a journalist named H. L. Mencken on Oct. 9, 1927. He wrote about his opinion on attending college, and it was interesting because it was during a different era. Mencken says there are too many students and they "drive the sweating professors frantic." Apparently, for this reason he would receive letters from students which were in Mencken's words, "describing the imbecilities that oppress them." They were asking for his opinion because many thought it would be wiser to quit college and get a job. Mencken disagreed.

"So long as it is believed the young man or woman who has been through college will have an advantage among us, and though that advantage may not run beyond the first few hurdles of life, it will remain of the utmost value there. What college has to teach, in the main, is simply familiarity with the notions and habits of that vast and mysterious organism known as human society. Two-thirds of the things that are taught in college, even when they are well taught, are not worth knowing. The main thing is to learn the difference between appearances and realities."

I was brought up believing you had to go to college: it wasn't a choice. College was always in my plans, so in my senior year I was filled with anticipation. Many of my friends and relatives told me the four years in college would be some of the most exciting times in my life. For the first time you are out on your own, hours from the familiarity of your hometown and the comfort of family and friends. Besides all of the things you learn in class, there is so much you learn when you are in the real world fending for yourself.

Mencken says, "The main thing is to learn the difference between appearances and realities." Besides the fact that nowadays you really need a degree, Mencken is right. When you go away to college, you leave behind your sheltered life and the high school dramas. For most, you do not worry what you wear to class, or care what others think of you anymore. The freedom you now have lets you become who you really are. You can rediscover yourself and find out things you never knew, do things you never thought you would or could do. You learn responsibility for things in the real world; it is a valuable experience, one that I highly recommend.

So, for those of us who are at this wonderful point in our lives when we can be absolutely crazy and no one is there to tie us down, we should take a step back every once in a while. Lie in the grass and stare at the sky. Climb a mountain and once you are at the top, look around and just think. Think of how much you have done and how much you have achieved in your life.

Remember back when you were the little guy running around like a nut with your friends in the street. Or think how pretty you used to be when you dressed up as princesses with your friends. In the words of Ferris Bueller, "Life moves pretty fast. If you don't stop and look around once in a while, you could miss it."

To the Editor:

I am a black female student in the Committee for the Collegiate Education of Black and other Minority Students (CCEBMS) program, and I am writing in regards to your opinion piece on the stand that ALANA Affairs has taken to reinstate minority programs as academic services to campus.

What the ALANA Affairs organizations are trying to accomplish is not only the survival of these programs, but also the survival of diversity on this campus.

Without minority support programs, it will be harder to attract minority students to a campus that cannot give them adequate support, especially those bilingual programs that are so greatly needed.

Finding comfort in an environment is a major key to a learning experience, and if I don't feel comfortable with the academic support networks or other aids available to me, this is a pressure that hinders me emotionally and mentally. And I think we all know what stress can mean to our academics regardless of race.

But I think I have to explain to you what pressure means to a minority. Being a black woman, I understand that many white people may see that our racism protests may seem repetitive, however the issue of the non-minority understanding the minority struggle is still misunderstood by many students.

We, as minority students, not only have to confront the pressures of the everyday student and human beings like: family, school, job, mental and physical health, etc. But we must add the pressures of being black, Chinese, Puerto Rican, Vietnamese, or of mix race parentage.

We often have to confront issues with being called racist slurs, proving ourselves against social labels and stereotypes, being accepted into a society that often negates us, and much more.

And these programs, their counselors and directors, and their academic support and personal support gave us stability, and the University dismantled that. I am not saying that we don't have other important issues on campus – only heaven knows what they are doing with the security these days – but what I am saying is that we need others to care about our struggle, and it can't just be the minority students protesting all the time. It has to be all people – white, black, Asian, Latino, rich, poor, middle class, whatever it may be.

Let me put It this way: if the students had a protest about the library hours and their support networks cut, I would be right there by my peers' side screaming for our rights. But if I am protesting to rehire my CCEBMS counselor because she was mine and other minority's support, would you be next to me?

You said it yourself: "...the student body and the administration needs to look for alternative ways to reestablish a program of some kind that both has value and gives the students who need it one-on-one advising that they can trust."

CCEBMS, BCP, NASS, and UALRC – those were the programs we "trusted." They were our backbone.

Berry comes up peachy

Legendary Chuck Berry wailed on his guitar and danced the night away on Sept. 27 at the Calvin Theater in Northampton.

By Peter Blandino
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

CHUCK BERRY
Sept. 27

NORTHAMPTON – The one and only Chuck Berry, the father of rock and the cousin of Marvin Berry, headlined the Calvin Theater last week. The aging legend did not disappoint his fans as he wailed away on his guitar and danced with more energy than Marty McFly. Berry played longer and harder than I expected and had me begging for an encore along with the rest of the capacity crowd for a full 15 minutes even after the house lights came on.

Both young and old filled the theater to witness a piece of history, and the opening acts to the show were as diverse as the crowd. A little before 8 p.m. the Holden Truelove Band took to the stage to warm up the crowd. At first sight I was shocked. Holden, who plays lead guitar and shares vocal duties with bass player Kyle Berardinelli, is no more than 15 years old! I am doubtful that the sum of the ages of all four band members equals the age of Berry, 72. The band warmed up with a loud instrumental number marked by tandem guitar melodies between Holden and Rob Nuzello.

Next, the band played a bluesy tune with young Truelove, introducing us to his singing capabilities. His voice, of course, sounded young and perhaps too clear for the blues, but it was strong as he belted out the verses with true passion. In a long interlude that at times seemed out of sync, Holden displayed his already refined skill on the guitar by delivering exciting riffs in an innovative solo. In perhaps the climax of the short set, Holden stepped off the stage and began playing in the aisle Albert Collins style.

Other noteworthy performances by the young band were two Hendrix covers, "There's a Red House Over Yonder" and "Voodoo Child." In the former, the head-band-bearing Berardinelli took lead vocals in a tribute to the legend. The latter saw Truelove botch the intro somewhat in an otherwise solid performance. "No. 1 Fan," an original of the band, was an impressive and catchy tune with a sound that compared early to mid-90s rock bands such as Green Day. The short set was taken very positively by those in attendance who marveled at the surprising combination of youth and talent during the intermission. But as the "father of rock 'n' roll" was introduced the anticipation in the air intensified reaching a fever pitch.

Dawning a sailor's cap that hid his eyes, Berry seized control of the stage to a roaring ovation. After a few quick tunes to help the house band warm up, he played a dazzling version of "Memphis, Tennessee." When the music stopped, he had successfully eliminated all doubt in some of the minds of the fans that may have thought this legend is too old to rock.

The next song, which was recently composed, was very soft and sweet, and served as a pleasant contrast. As Berry strummed his guitar and delivered his lyrics ever so eloquently, the band played softly. He sang sweetly about his wild life as a superstar performer: the long nights, the women, the wine. He sang, "it ain't good for me but I'm feeling fine." Although he is approaching his exit from life's stage, he refuses to let down a bit, but instead continues to combine charisma and showmanship with his incredible skill to entertain crowds across the country.

"Let's Play the Blues," and Berry and the band stirred up that old blues standard, "It Hurts Me Too." A long interlude featured Berry soloing softly. He reminded the crowd, "It don't have to be loud to be good." The father of rock then picked up the pace and played a series of renowned hits beginning with "Hail, Hail Rock n' Roll," followed by "Sweet Little Sixteen" and finished the trio with none other than "Johnny B. Good." When he stomped his foot to signal the end of the song to the house band, the crowd was on their feet in tribute.

For his final number Berry played "Roll Over Beethoven." The legend jammed away at his guitar, and called out for all of the ladies in attendance to come join him on stage. The resulting scene was one I won't soon forget; a 72-year-old rock legend dancing and playing with about 15 women, young and old, who were literally hanging on his arms as he played his music.

Berry offered a whole lot of excitement for one night. The man started it all, and now decades after he first hit the big time, he still plays with more charm, charisma, and energy than many of the top acts out there. The band behind him sounded like they could use a bit more rehearsing, and Berry is by no means the man he once was. But even with a few obvious flaws, the concert was still impeccable.

Let's play 'What video game console is best?'

Battle of the high-tech entertainment systems

This past summer I'm sure most of you University of Massachusetts students, like myself, dwindled away the summer hours sitting in front of your favorite video game system. I'm sure most of you have even dragged that habit over into this fall semester. The top three systems on the market today are Playstation 2, X-Box, and Gamecube.

But do you happen to be one of the few that doesn't own one and you want to know the difference between the three? Well, read on fellow gamer, read on.

WITH REID DAVENPORT

The Playstation 2 (also known as PS2) is possibly the best choice for the all-around gamer. From the brutal Grand Theft Auto 3 to the popular role playing game Final Fantasy 10, there are a variety of titles available. Its ability to play upright is good for cramming it next to your 50 inch TV. Not only that, but the price has dropped to $200 from $300.

Much like most systems, the PS2 does not come with a game, or even a demo disk, and it only has one controller. So to get your PS2 up and running you'll need to shell out a couple of extra bucks for a game, but it isn't so bad since there a few decent titles around for under $25. Plus it will now cost you around $35 for a PS2 memory card, so think before you buy. It also plays your average DVD. But there's a down side.

Don't expect some high quality DVD viewing from the PS2. There's no zoom feature so all the movies you watch will be in letterbox format, unless you buy a DVD that is labeled "Playstation 2 Compatible."

Thankfully, you can simply use your controller to watch the DVDs.

Worried you'd have to forget about the old Playstation (PSX) games? Well the PS2 also plays the old Playstation games, and you can use a PSX memory card, but only with PSX games.

If you're looking for crisp graphics in a system and a decent DVD player then try the X-Box. The X-Box, although possibly the heaviest and biggest system in recent years, is well worth its $250 price with smooth graphics and excellent DVD play. Still not convinced? Well the Microsoft manufactured system also has its own hard drive to store saved games on. Therefore, you don't have to shell out another $30 for a memory card.

Much like its counterparts, the X-Box has acquired some games that are made strictly for X-Box. The most popular is the first-person shooter Halo. It's a game suitable for most ages, since you are simply shooting at alien scum and not humans. Regardless of that, you will again need to bust out the wallet to get a game, but almost any game on the X-Box can entertain you for hours.

Most of the titles you liked on PS2 are also available on X-Box. Some X-Box versions will even have smoother graphics and possibly have some changes within the games. The DVD playback is excellent, but there's a major downside to DVD viewing on the X-Box. In order to watch DVDs you are going to need to toss $30 into the system for a remote control and two AAA batteries for the remote. If you can ignore the fact that the DVD playback requires a clicker, this is definitely the system to buy.

Are you about a hundred bucks short of affording an X-Box or a PS2? Try the Nintendo Gamecube. Nintendo's latest system delivers a powerful punch for something that looks like the toaster on your kitchen counter. The small cubed system plays a new version of game disks that has a diameter of about two inches. You'll probably be confused the first time you open a Gamecube game and see the disk.

The positives of this system are that it is completely capable of going head-to-head with its competitors graphics-wise, but it lacks gaming backup. Most of the titles on X-Box or PS2 are not available on Gamecube. No GTA3 for Gamecube and no DVD features either. The Gamecube is too small to be able to play your favorite DVD movies. That's not the only disappointment of the Gamecube as the titles it currently has are mainly aimed at younger children.

However, Resident Evil is possibly one of its greatest releases thus far and is easily a reason to grab the Gamecube. The games are not extreme-ly violent, but they will be able to entertain you and blow you away with clear graphics. Again if you're going to buy it you will have to empty your wallet into a game and a memory card. Plus, if the system ever dies, the handle makes it a nice melee weapon to knock out friends with. Just kidding.

Overall, the average college gamer is safer buying a PS2 or an X-Box as it enables one to get in depth into a gaming system. Both systems cover all grounds from sports to role-playing games. If you old school gamers are missing your Super Nintendo, or you just want something to keep you occupied in that oh-so-boring 9:05 a.m. class, then go out and buy the Gameboy Advanced. It runs at about $80 and the titles may be different, but they're just hand-held versions of your favorite SNES games with new titles.

Everything from Super Mario World to Yoshi's Island is available on the lone hand-held system. The graphics are nice and smooth and it gets plenty of battery life to last through a whole fifty-minute lecture. Not that I recommend it or anything.

Humble nature aside, Duritz truly hasn't had the need to resort to such desperate measures. Audiences and critics have been warmly accepting the band since 1993, which saw the release of August and Everything After, an album out of left field that sparked the record industry to rethink what a modern rock band could be. It quickly became an emotional reference point for fans in search of a band capable of combining lyrical honesty with pop sensibilities.

More than a vehicle for the pair of radio hits it generated ("Mr. Jones" and "Round Here"), August succeeded on its own terms as an album that stubbornly defied popular expectation. Nine years later it remains a cornerstone of the early-90s music scene, as well as a valuable resource for the band itself.

"In a lot of ways, August was more of a learning process, and from that came something I wanted to do, which was Recovering the Satellites," says Duritz. "By the same token, I think there were a lot of lessons learned and experimentation on This Desert Life that enabled us to use all the things we'd learned on previous albums to make Hard Candy. That doesn't make them better – in a lot of ways, it's hell – but for a lot of people, August is a huge touchstone in their lives. For me, it's a big learning experience, and that's great. I don't think you can decide how you're going to touch other people's lives. I just don't think it's up to you."

What was up to Duritz and his band-mates during the recording of Hard Candy, as with all previous efforts, was the chance to build and experiment in an accepting environment. From the organic moods of August to the tightly penned, smoothly crooned tracks on Hard Candy, the band continually found itself arriving at common ideas pieced together by individual emotions and influences.

"Most of the songs on [Hard Candy] started with a basic song structure that I had," says Duritz. "We also were doing some woodshedding in my basement before we started the record, just three or four of us. [A song] can happen in a number of different ways – "Good Time" is an example of that. I wrote all the chords and came in and played it for the band. Now, that thing on the record is nothing like that – it started as me on the piano and on the record it's a mixture of Isaac Hayes and Led Zeppelin and a James Taylor folk song. When you're in a band like Counting Crows, it's intensely collaborative... it's very much a process we go through together."

Though Duritz freely admits to administering more control over his lyrics ("I find it's hard [to share]...it's like having multiple personalities – too many points of view"), he's equally as forthcoming with the idea of hindsight, and how radically it can open even his own interpretations of an album he's labored over with love.

"I don't write with [themes] in mind," he says. "It's like you eat when you're hungry. I write when I'm moved to write. I mean, you have to think thematically when you're in the context of the song, when you're focusing and forming it, but you don't sit down and say, 'Today I'm going to write a song about memory.' [Laughs]. I'm more likely to, as in the case with a song like "Hard Candy," pull a photo out of a drawer and look at it and think about everything in the photo – and then write about it.

"It really gets fleshed out for me when talking about it in interviews. When you're talking about it and looking at it from a distance, it's like being in school and reading a book. You analyze it in ways the author probably never did. I think it's "Huck Finn" where Twain says anyone who attempts to analyze it should be 'hung, drawn and quartered' – something like that. It becomes such a different thing to write rather than read."

Equally as different for Duritz have been the comforts and challenges facing any band that's been around the corner and back. The shift from studio to stage, for a musician, is a process that parallels the time from conception to birth and carries its own variety of growing pains. Though it is four albums into a successful career, Duritz insists that the same rules and feelings still apply to the band as when it first began – discomfort included.

"We work in [studios], we have to be in them, but I just don't like being there," he says. "They're fine for a day, but they're not a place to build or feel."

And, while the band's attitude towards touring ("You're just always looking to be moved") hasn't changed significantly, he concedes that the most recent tours have benefited from a deeper catalogue of songs to pull from, allowing the band to move around the world with "different sets and different feelings." That freedom has opened Duritz up to at least one variable that has perhaps changed more than any other over the last nine years: the fans.

"I think the audience you're talking about is so different every time," Duritz says. "Those guys aren't in college anymore – that was ten years ago, and we're playing colleges again. People coming to the Mullins Center may have been 13 when August came out. If you were 35 or in your thirties, around my age now, when August came out, then you're 45 now. That's a big life change."

The life changes Duritz has undergone have fallen heavily under the critical public eye, though at the end of the day, the singer may have a better grasp on hindsight than he allows himself to believe. His songs are specific pointers to places and people from his past – brave public confessions of private things. As his band forges ahead on the road (about a year is left on the current jaunt) he's already reflecting on life and the daily grind it can become.

"You always want something more out of your life, you know?" he says. "You always want the day to be a little better than it is. I think that's what insomniac's do: they sit there waiting for something a little better to happen. It's not coming. I mean, that's your day. And it's ok."

And, as with any musician, it's about finding a balance between life and art, two things that could easily be called one and the same.

"I don't worry about writing – I'll go two years without writing, but I don't think of it as writer's block. I just think of it as being on tour. I've got these ideas I want to work on, but if I don't? It ain't the end of the world.

"You don't really spend your life qualifying your work against itself." He pauses. "It seems to me a waste of time spending Monday trying to figure out if it's better than Thursday."

Tickets for the 8 p.m. show on Sat. are still available and can be purchased at the Mullins Center box office. Tickets are $31.

Horoscopes

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 21) – Good things come to those who wait. In bed.
SCORPIO (Oct. 22-Nov. 21) – The stars reveal a new path to happiness to you during a time of great despair. Either that or your going to fail Physics. The stars, they can be real tricky sometimes.
SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) – The cosmos today remind you to wear your nuclear boots and drip-dry gloves, because here she comes again.
CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) – Listen to the radio today – you're just another brick in the wall. And not a particularly bright one at that.
AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) – Today's going to be a great day for you. You're just in the zone today. Man, I wish I was you, you lucky bastard.
PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) – Cosmically speaking, living your life by a three line horoscope isn't logical. Instead, you should just pick your favorite horoscope and go with that one. I think you should pick Gemini – there aren't any of those really anyway.
ARIES (March 21-April 19) — The stars are sending a very clear message: shake, shake, shake Senora, shake your body line! You heard the stars – work it, baby.
TAURUS (April 20-May 20) – Later today you will face a great crisis when the batteries in your remote stop working on the Lifetime channel. I see much Bea Arthur in your future.
GEMINI (May 21-June 20) – You will be presented with the answer to a great question today. Unfortunately, it will be too late, and the rascal Ben Stein will keep his money.
CANCER (June 21-July 22) – Some friendly advice will seem stupid at first, but once you get good and drunk it seems like a good idea.
LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) – Look on the bright side – having a beagle implanted in your chest is a great icebreaker.
VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) – Finding a new friendship is always the signal of a good day. Unfortunately, your new friend makes Hannibal Lector look stable. Hide the chianti.

Soccer finally back to the pitch

UM to play for first time in two weeks

By Andy Vogt
COLLEGIAN STAFF

On Sept. 22, the Massachusetts women's soccer team stood with a record of 1-0. Nearly two weeks later, as the squad prepares to embark on one of its toughest road trips of the 2002 campaign, it stands with a record of 1-6.

Rarely do NCAA Division I soccer programs remain idle for a fortnight in between contests. But the Minutewomen (0-1 A-10) have had the misfortune of seeing no official competition since their 6-2 loss to Auburn on Sept. 22.

With its last contest at Syracuse rained out at halftime due to the remnants of Hurricane Isidore, the Maroon and White has played 45 minutes of (unofficial) soccer in 12 days. As UMass travels to Ohio this weekend for two tough matchups with Xavier and Dayton, will the long hiatus from play doom a team in dire need of a win?

"Even though we didn't finish the game with Syracuse, we still got a half in, and it was a half that proved we could kick and bite and really tough it out," junior goalkeeper Kelly Nigh said. "We got the mentality of the game in, so we really don't feel like we have a disadvantage."

However, the disadvantage might come in facing a Xavier team (4-5-0, 0-1 A-10) that always contends in the Atlantic 10 and a Dayton squad (7-2-0, 1-0 A-10) that destroyed everything in its path last season and is off to an impressive start already in 2002.

The Musketeers' scoring punch this year has come predominantly from sophomore forward Lauren Giesting, who has already found the back of the net three times this season. Junior forward Tracy Veith has also contributed offense for Xavier, tallying five points through the first nine games.

In terms of game plan against XU tonight, Nigh said that the Minutewomen planned to defend against the Musketeers' offensive game plan.

"Xavier has a really long throw, that's their primary attack," she said.

"Everything from [midfield] down is basically a corner kick.

"We're just hoping to counter-attack, and just absorb and attack," she added.

Dayton, meanwhile, is skyhigh after picking up its seventh win of the season against Oakland on Sept. 29. The defensive-minded Flyers have caused havoc for opposing offenses this year, allowing an anemic five goals in their nine games, posting five shutouts. UD has surrendered two scores in a game only once this year, a tough loss to Illinois on Sept. 27.

The Flyers' main source of defensive prowess has come in the form of goalkeeper Stephanie Weisenfeld, who has stymied opponents to the tune of a 0.56 GAA and a save percentage of .847. Tesia Kozlowski has been a machine at midfield, recording a ridiculous 17 points in just nine games of action. Eight other Flyers have found the scoresheet as well so far this season. The Maroon and White has not been as fortunate in lighting up the scoreboard, as it has tallied as many goals this year (six) as Kozlowski has alone.

Although the Minutewomen have played one game against an A-10 opponent (a 5-0 loss to Rhode Island on Sept. 6), this weekend marks the true start of the conference schedule. Last year, UMass entered the final weekend of the season needing to knock off either squad to qualify for an A-10 postseason berth. Unfortunately for the Minutewomen, the two Buckeye State teams came to Amherst and knocked off the Maroon and White in succession, ending its playoff chances.

Is revenge on the minds of the Minutewomen? Mostly, they just want to assert themselves as a team that can be a force during the second half of the year.

"Right now, we're just looking at this as the beginning of our second season," Nigh said. "I think it'll be a good challenge to say 'are we going to be ready to make the A-10 tournament?'"

Lindsey Bellini scored a goal in each of UMass' last two games.

Alexi Rudd (left) and the women's soccer team have not played in an official game since a 6-2 loss to Auburn on Sept. 22. The Minutewomen have three games in the next eight days.

Still looking for number one

Syracuse up next for winless UMass

By Todd Foster
COLLEGIAN STAFF

With the Atlantic 10 season a week away, the Massachusetts field hockey team is looking to pick its play and shock all the doubters. With half a season under their belts, the younger players have improved their play, which has been obvious in the last four games.

"[The team] has held up well. Winning makes everything happy," Head Coach Patty Shea said. "The minute things don't tend bother you when you are winning. When you are losing, every little thing starts to wear on you. We know what we have to do and what everyone has to do on the same day, bottom line."

The Minutewomen have seen better years, but Shea is confident in her team and knows that the A-10 part of the schedule is what really matters. Shea also feels that UMass is still the top team in the A-10 until someone takes away its conference title – something that no team has accomplished in six years.

"Our goal has always been our conference," Shea said. "You look at our record right now; we still have a chance to win a national title. You take care of your conference and that gets you into the NCAA Tournament. That's the beautiful thing about having a strong conference."

The Minutewomen have struggled to a 0-9 record (0-0 A-10). Continuing with a tough schedule, the Maroon and White will play host to the 19th-ranked Syracuse Orangewomen on Richard F. Garber Field at 7 p.m. tonight.

SU is the defending Big East champion and advanced to the quarterfinals of last year's NCAA tourney before falling to ACC powerhouse Maryland. After a successful 16-4 mark last year, the Orangewomen returned nine starters and were predicted to battle with Boston College for the top spot in the Big East, but have gotten off to a slow start with a 5-4 record (1-1 Big East).

The Syracuse defense posts a 1.3 GAA, 15th best in the nation. Third team All-American netminder Audrey Latsko and 5th-year senior defender Becky Kohler anchor the defense. Kohler is serving her second year as co-captain, while Latsko is ranked among the top goalies in the nation.

"We have to go to the ball, that's our strong suit and we have to take the risk to do it," Shea said. "Also, we need to be stronger in our individual defense. We have to attack the goal and shoot the ball."

The Orangewomen's offensive stats don't measure up to the 2001 season. Last year, SU averaged 2.48 goals per game, but this year has declined greatly with a scoring average of 1.3 goals. With UMass struggling to score as well, the game could come down to whoever can strike first.

Syracuse's offensive attack is lead by co-captain/midfielder Kristin Aronowicz, the 2001 Big East Offensive Player of the Year. The Second Team All-American posted a career-high 37 points last season, including a Big East-leading 17 goals. With 81 career points, Aronowicz needs only 13 points to pass Julie Williamson and Yvonne Milionis to become the school's all-time leading scorer. Aronowicz, however, has only five points on the season.

Helping out with the offense, co-captain forward Michelle Marks and forward Lindsay Pierson are tied for the scoring lead, with six points apiece. Pierson's points have all come on goals, while Marks has two goals and two assists.

On Sept. 29, Syracuse went up against its Big East rival, 17th-ranked Boston College. BC scored two goals in the first 16 minutes of the game and never looked back. The Eagles shut out the Orangewomen, 2-0, and handed SU its first Big East loss since 2000.

UMass and Syracuse have similar stories to their seasons – teams with high expectations struggling to find their way back to the top of their respected conferences. The Minutewomen are looking for a win before they start thinking about next week. An upset over a nationally ranked team would give a lot of momentum to the Maroon and White going into its first A-10 game against Richmond on Oct. 11.

Oozefest volleyball a success

Participants above and below in the second annual Oozefest frolick in the mud after their competition Saturday afternoon. The event drew 76 volleyball players and 200 participants.

Event draws 200 spectators

COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

More than 200 people braved muddy conditions Saturday at the University of Massachusetts' Totman Gym grounds to attend Oozefest.

The second annual mud volleyball tournament was sponsored by Student Alumni Relations Society (STARS) and funded by the Alumni Association.

Over 70 students participated in the event, which fielded nine teams immersed in six inches of mud. Teams were comprised of members of STARS, the Panhelenic Council and other students on campus.

Teams came from as far as the University of Connecticut and Clark University to participate in the games.

"I had a blast," said STARS member and sophomore Meghan DiNapoli. The idea of Oozefest originates from a University of Connecticut theme where participation in their event reaches the masses.

"[UConn] had an Oozefest tradition that has been going on for about twenty years now," Oozefest Chairman Keith Healey explained. "And every year at least twenty teams compete."

Nearly nine thousand gallons of water were dropped on the fields in anticipation of the event. Spectators stopping were welcomed to enjoy the games, music, free samples of Coca-Cola and Delano's pizza.

"We love mud!" said junior Laura Klesh, who was a part of this year's winning team, Those Guy's Over There. Coming in a close second and getting just as dirty was the team, the Defending Champs.

"It was more fun than a barrel of three monkey," said senior Mike Penney.

"Overall it was a great success," Healy said. "People are what is going to make Oozefest a huge event. I mean, what beats pizza, soda and mud on a hot October day."

STARS is a student run alumni association that connects current UMass students with alumni from the University. The group is well known for putting on events and activities such as the Welcome Mug and Welcome Bundle program, in which the group hand delivers mugs filled with candy to first-year students along with a handwritten note from home.

The club also co-sponsors a tuition raffle on Family Day. Each year a winner is drawn out of the raffle at halftime during the football game and that individual can win up to 4,000 towards tuition.

Over the next few months, STARS will continue to supply the University's students with entertainment and events. The STARS calendar of event includes a semi-formal and the Commencement Ball in May.

Prowler reported in dorms again

Police report that the prowler is a 5-foot-9 light-skinned black or Hispanic male with a slender build and short-cropped black hair. The man is allegedly between 30 and 40 years old and was wearing a white t-shirt, jeans, and a black jacket at the time of the incidents.

By Dan Lamothe
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Two more students have come forward to the University of Massachusetts police department with reports of a man breaking and entering their room.

The incidents connect the prowler in Mary Lyon reported last week in The Collegian to two other separate incidents the weekend of Sept. 28.

The residents, from Mary Lyon and Field Dormitories, respectively, both reported that the man entered their rooms and then immediately left when he realized that the rooms were occupied. UMPD detectives suspect that his motivation for entering the rooms was theft of personal properties.

The new incidents reported all occur within 24 hours of the original incident, which transpired at 3 p.m. Sept. 28. The resident in Field reported being walked in on at around 5 p.m. on Sept. 28. A second resident in Mary Lyon reported being walked in on at 4 p.m. Sept. 27.

In the original incident reported, a female resident in Mary Lyon said that while she was out of her room and upstairs for a few minutes, a light-skinned black male entered her room. Allegedly, the man in the room was drunk. He asked her to use the phone. She said it was broken and the man left.

From the combined reports of the three students, UMPD has released a new sketch and description of the individual. Police say that the man is a 30 to 40 year-old light-skinned black or Hispanic male, 5-foot-9 tall, with a slender build and short-cropped black hair. He was wearing a white t-shirt, jeans, and a black jacket at the time of the incidents.

Law enforcement agencies on campus are stressing the need to call 911 immediately after coming into contact with anyone resembling the individual in question. Also as general safety tips the police stress that students keep their dormitory rooms, cars and apartments locked at all times and avoid allowing access to the dormitory by individuals without an access key.

They also suggest that students get to know their neighbors and look for unfamiliar faces and strange situations in their building or on their floor.

Anyone with any information regarding these or other incidents should contact the police as soon as possible.

Information can be relayed to the Detective Bureau at 545-0893. Anonymous tips can be sent to police forces through the UMPD Tips Hotline, 577-TIPS, or sent through email to the UMass web site: www.umass.edu/umpd.

Sigma Phi Epsilon hosts car wash for cancer fund

By Lindsay Kirkham
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

The Sigma Phi Epsilon fraternity held a charity carwash yesterday morning at Rafters Sports Bar and Grill to raise money for the American Cancer Society.

Although the fraternity participates in various charity events, this occasion has special significance because one of their fraternity brothers recently lost his mother to cancer. All proceeds from the carwash will be donated to a fund in memory of her.

"We've done the Red Cross [carwash] many times in the past," said Eric Goldstein, a junior History Education major. "It's just now we have a different cause. Now we have something at stake."

The three-hour-long event, ran from 9 a.m. to noon and was expected to have grossed between $250 and $300. The going rate was $5 per car, but more funds were accumulated through larger donations and from people passing by without time to wait pulling over and making a contribution when they saw the "Carwash for Cancer" signs.

"My car was dirty, and the money goes to an admirable cause. Why not?" said Lisa Jennings, a senior art major who stopped by to have her car washed.

The flow of cars remained steady as all of the brothers, some sorority members and traffic off the street stopped by to get their vehicles cleaned.

Nick Reed, a senior, said on behalf of all 57 members of the fraternity participating, "To all those people who say all we do is party, we were all out here at 9 a.m. on a Sunday morning raising money for a good cause."

Despite the special circumstances of this event, the fraternity is active in other charity work as well, including such organizations as the Red Cross, Shelter Sunday, the Survival Center, and Toys for Tots. Last year, they raised $1400 for a Sept. 11 fund within three days of the attacks.

"We try to do more for the community than the average fraternity. That's what makes Sig Eps stand out," said Blake Kleppe, a sophomore Biochemistry/Molecular Biology and Philosophy major.

Planned upcoming events include a canned food drive for Thanksgiving and a toy drive for Christmas.

Amherst College to host subject of book for lecture

Cedric Jennings, subject of the book, A Hope in the Unseen: An American Odyssey from the Inner City to the Ivy League, will speak at Amherst College Thursday, Oct. 10 at 7:30 p.m. in Room 115 of Fayerweather Hall.

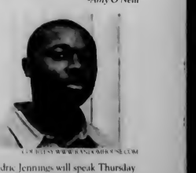
Wall Street Journal reporter Rob Suskind told the story of Jennings' rise from an inner city school in Washington D.C., to being accepted for a summer program at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology (MIT) to attending Brown University. Suskind went to Ballou High School to find a subject that he felt would be interesting to write about. After he witnessed a scene between Jennings and the principal over a miscalculated grade, he knew that Jennings was the subject he wanted to interview.

"Cedric has a basic kind of hope that I found very affecting when I met him," Suskind said in an interview with Kathy Spinelli at Randomhouse.com.

Jennings will discuss his hope and faith in himself at the lecture, which is sponsored by the Charles Houston Forum for Law and Social Justice, the Dean of the Faculty, and the American Studies Department.

"Faith is the substance of things hoped for and things not seen," Jennings told Spinelli during the interview.

At his inner-city high school, 12 males out of 1,389 students are able to attain a B average. Jennings was accepted to the summer Minority Introduction to Engineering and Science Program at MIT after his junior year. The following year he was accepted to Brown University, where he is a 1999 graduate.



The book follows his path from high school to Brown and won praise from people all over.

"This beautiful, poignant, hopeful book tells the story of an incredible young man and what it's like to grow up in a world that is completely alien to some Americans" Marian Wright Edelman, president of The Children's Defense Fund, said on readerschoicebooks.com. "But it is tragically all too familiar to too many children."

For more information on the lecture, call Amherst College Public Affairs Office at 542-2321.

EDITORIAL/OPINION

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM ED OP EDITOR: JAMIE LOO

Let them debate:

Third party speaks

Last week, Republican gubernatorial candidate Mitt Romney responded to the Democratic gubernatorial candidate, Shannon O'Brien's call for more debates under the condition that the next debate would include all five candidates on the November ballot. Independent candidate Barbara Johnson, Libertarian Carla Howell and Green party candidate Jill Stein will join O'Brien and Romney in the WLVI TV 56 studios on Wednesday evening. This will be the third gubernatorial debate of five and will be the first one that features the Libertarian, Independent and Green party candidates.

The freedom to run for political office and to present your platforms has always been an ideal in politics. Unfortunately, up until recently not all of the candidates have been presented the forum to put forth their views. The press has not always been sympathetic to third party candidates, who end up receiving little to no coverage in the mainstream press. This is an obvious pitfall in the democratic process for these candidates, since the media is the best vehicle for disseminating your views. Furthermore, most of the debates only feature the two big party candidates, the Republican and Democratic candidates. For a long time there were no other candidates, but now that there are an increasing number of third party candidates getting involved in the Commonwealth and nationally, we must hold faster to the first amendment. The people that run for office and those that already govern our institutions must learn to evolve with these changes and let other candidates in on the debates.

A clear example of this is the last presidential election, where Green party candidate Ralph Nader was barred from participating in the debate that took place at UMass-Boston. In the end, Nader still managed to pull in three percent of the overall voter population, but was short of his goal of five percent. Some of the rationale in keeping third-party candidates out of debates is that they lack the support to win. If they aren't given the chance to air their platforms then of course they have no chance to build up a base of supporters. In 1992, when third-party candidate Ross Perot was allowed to debate, 90 million viewers tuned in, supporting the idea that people want to hear from all of the candidates.

As a political candidate the freedom to present your platforms is essential to campaigning. More importantly, hearing every candidate's point of view is essential to keeping the flow of democracy going. The absence of varying political ideas and views leaves us with fewer choices as voters and less of a chance for changes in politics in the future. It will be encouraging to see all five candidates on the November ballot debating on Wednesday. These candidates have worked hard to earn their spots on the ballot and deserve to have their platforms heard. Including the third party candidates in these debates will only help to broaden the discussion on important issues in the Commonwealth such as healthcare, public higher education and the state income tax. Their participation is an important precedent in the democratic process in Massachusetts and hopefully, will continue in future elections.

Worcester: If it's the 3rd largest city in New England, why hasn't my spell check heard of it?! I've lived in Worcester, Mass. my entire life and I have enjoyed growing up there. As an All-American city award recipient, it is an ideal mix of a diverse, bustling city and a friendly, residential town. I know it is not exactly a hot vacation destination (to say the least!), yet it is a city that definitely does not deserve its grungy reputation as being the "armpit of Massachusetts." As stated above, it is one of the largest cities in New England, behind Boston and Providence. I know what some of you are thinking: isn't Worcester that sketchy city about an hour from Boston that's difficult to drive in and where there's nothing to do? Just like any big city, Worcester (or Woosta or WuTown as some people snicker) has its wealthy, beautiful sections as well as poorer downtown and inner city projects. You wouldn't believe how many times someone has told me Worcester is scary, ugly, or they've never ventured there unless they really had to. I've had people say an ignorant comment such as "it's pretty ghetto there huh?" and thank their lucky stars that they're from a quaint town or a "real city" like Boston.

Working on the beach this past summer, I had several out-of-state people stare blankly up at me in my lifeguard chair when I told them where I was from. I mean, I know Jay Leno proves most Americans don't know anything about their surroundings, but come on! Worcester is a huge city! Their confusion was ended when I asked, "Have you heard of Worchester?" Their sudden recognition was not surprising, probably because even my computer's spell check corrects the spelling of Worcester to make it Worchester.

Although underrated, Worcester has several top colleges and universities that seem to be overlooked as top institutions of higher learning. The College of the Holy Cross, Clark University (the only university Sigmund Freud lectured at), and Worcester Polytechnic Institute (WPI) are all prestigious schools that attract students from all over the world, yet Worcester is not known as a great college town. I don't understand why when there is a plethora of good restaurants and shopping, attractive parks and huge performance areas.

This summer, Jesse Burkett Little League of the Tatnuck Square Area of Worcester, the league I played for as a kid, made it to the Little League World Series and showed the world on ESPN, game after game, what Worcester could do (Go Worcester!). Sounds cheesy, but I cheered on the adorable players from my house at the Cape (well, not my house, poor lifeguards don't have cable! We were really at a restaurant where my dad and I were the only people paying attention to the game). Not only were the players honored at a ceremony in the city, they were also given "keys" to the city, had a chance to meet the Red Sox, and threw the first pitch at Fenway for that night's game. Worcester has a tradition of honoring its "local heroes" and takes pride in the value of community.

"You wouldn't believe how many times someone has told me Worcester is scary, ugly, or they've never ventured there unless they really had to."

The heroism of the Worcester Fire Department was seen in 1999 when six firefighters were killed in line-of-duty deaths fighting a warehouse fire. Their heroism is still honored throughout the city, and as my dad and uncle are Worcester firefighters, I saw firsthand how much their public service was appreciated. It was appreciated not only by the members of our city, but also by then-President Clinton and Vice-President Gore who led a ceremony I was lucky enough to see after the fires that winter. The public sector is very much a lively part of Worcester, which I feel is one of the best aspects of the city, because we have a great deal of community involvement as opposed to larger, more impersonal cities.

Being a very diverse city, Worcester embraces public education, the appreciation of various cultures and public service organizations whose efforts benefit the community. Many languages are spoken and there is a large population of Hispanic and Vietnamese people as well as many other nationalities that make the city a place of culture as well as tradition.

Still not convinced Worcester has anything good to offer? Several interesting facts about Worcester are that the first National Women's Rights Convention was held here. Abbey Hoffman, a radical 1960's activist, lived in Worcester (he's the guy with the beard shouting at the rally in Forrest Gump) and famous actor Dennis Leary is from Worcester. Frank Sinatra was the first entertainer to perform at the Worcester Centrum. Worcester also has a large newspaper, The Telegram and Gazette, great local bookstores, famous three-decker apartments (not the sandwich people!), Higgins Armory Museum featuring ancient knights of armor, and a famous art museum.

Yes, bored Worcester teenagers cruise Main Street, there aren't many stylish clubs or bars, schools are sometimes overcrowded and loud (yet provide amazing education), and once in a while crime happens. But every place has nice people and rude people, pretty neighborhoods and cluttered downtown apartments. It is unique large cities like Worcester, which make interesting places to live and learn. The image of Worcester as being a dirty, disintegrating city is one that is not deserved. How can you not love a city that produced such talent as Harvey Ball, the Worcester graphic artist who designed the original yellow smiley face?:)

Watching with Bleary Eyes

SEAN JACQUET

One of my professors voiced a common complaint the other day: "I have such a hard time staying up to watch the baseball playoffs."

It's true. In yet another demonstration of ineptitude, Major League Baseball has botched the scheduling of the Division Series. Some West Coast games don't begin until 11 p.m. Eastern time, while the 8 p.m. games often don't end until well after midnight.

What does this mean for those of us that have to drag ourselves out of bed for a 9 a.m. class? Or what about those fans that have to get up at 7 a.m. for work? Can't the games be scheduled to accommodate these people so they don't have to force themselves to stay up or tape the game for later viewing?

The answer is yes. Fans don't need to sit bleary-eyed on their couches to watch Randy Johnson can shut down the St. Louis Cardinals (he didn't, the Cardinals won 12-2).

For whatever reason, Major League Baseball doesn't seem to want to cater to the fans: those who buy the tickets, fill the ballparks and make the game the multi-billion dollar industry it is. If MLB bigwigs cared about the average fan who schedule a game at 11 p.m. Eastern on 8 p.m. start time is too late. Do you think the average 10-year-old know-it-all baseball fanatic has the staying power or the freedom to make it to 1 a.m. in the morning to see the Angels pull out an 8-6 victory over the Yankees? Yeah, I don't think so either.

Of course, MLB hopes to maximize ratings by spreading out the games and not making them overlap. This is a good strategy, but when they schedule games too late at night they jeopardize their ability to attract younger fans and keep older fans.

Then again, baseball doesn't seem to care much about the fans. I suppose we're lucky to even have the playoffs this year. This is the postseason that almost wasn't. The players and owners averted a strike with an eleventh-hour deal that we're all supposed to be grateful for. The two sides promised not to squabble for another four years, but what will happen in 2006? Will we be subjected to more labor talks or the threat of another strike? Will we be as patient and understanding the next time these millionaires renew their fight over billions of dollars?

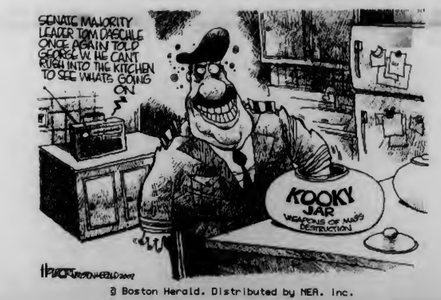
We've been taken for granted long enough. We don't want to hear the nuances of revenue sharing. We don't want to hear players complain about random steroid testing. We grow restless when we see players refusing to hustle. We get angry when players don't sign autographs for starry-eyed six-year-old kids.

We want to see these guys play. Playoff baseball is a great time, one of the first true signs of autumn. Once, the nation's unquestioned pastime baseball can still enthrall America every October. This is when the best play the best. All the pretenders have gone home. Only the elite remain. Soon the field will be whittled from eight teams to four. Then two. Then one.

Major League Baseball has a golden opportunity to let its stars shine. Yet somehow they manage to blow it. On Monday night, Randy Johnson, arguably the best pitcher in baseball took the mound for the defending champion Arizona Diamondbacks against the resilient St. Louis Cardinals. The Cardinals, playing without their number two starter and team leader Darryl Kile who died in June, lit up the menacing 6-foot-11 lefty and won 12-2. Yet, few east of Arizona saw the mighty Johnson lose just his sixth game all season. The game started at 11 p.m. Eastern and didn't end until after 2 a.m.

Also on Monday night, Yankees center fielder Bernie Williams drilled a game-breaking three-run homer in the eighth to lead the Yankees to an 8-5 victory over the Anaheim Angels in what had been a great back and forth battle. The next night, the Angels prevailed 8-6 over the mighty Yankees in another splendid game. But both games ended well past midnight leaving those that couldn't stay awake to find out what a fine game they'd missed.

It boggles my mind that Major League Baseball can't find a better way to take advantage of playoff baseball. The excitement, the star-power and the high quality of play should be a formula for success. Yet, ratings are down despite the magnificent baseball being played. Could that be because games are scheduled at absurd times? Major League Baseball is robbing the fans of the chance to see the players and the games that could bring baseball back to the forefront of American sports culture.



Barry Zito, Jason Giambi, Curt Schilling, Barry Bonds, Torii Hunter, Derek Jeter, Jim Edmonds, Gary Sheffield, Chipper Jones: these are the players that make this year's postseason so compelling. Yet, with awkward scheduling, few people can afford to watch these athletes play. If only the MLB brass would schedule games at reasonable times, baseball could captivate old fans while securing young fans.

Major League Baseball should take a lesson from the NFL. In a stroke of public relations genius, the NFL scheduled a stand-alone Thursday night opener between the San Francisco 49ers and the New York Giants. Capturing the opportunity to make the most out of Opening Day, the NFL delighted fans by allowing the much anticipated season opener to come three days earlier. In doing so, the NFL heightened anticipation for the full slate of game on Sunday.

Major League Baseball has a wonderful product that they just can't seem to market properly. At every turn we hear the whining and bickering of players, owners, and even umpires, distracting attention from where it really belongs: the field. Baseball would be wise to take a page out of the NFL's book, and make the game more fan-accessible, especially during the best part of the season.

Commissioner Bud Selig and company have survived the threat of a strike and the stink of contraction, but how much more will fans put up with? Fans are growing weary of NARC extraordinaire Selig and the public relations disaster that is Major League Baseball. Major League Baseball has a chance to begin repairing its marred public image by giving baseball back to the fans. Baseball still has a long way to go before it finally regains public trust and begins to challenge football as America's pastime, but rescheduling the game times to make them more fan-friendly is a good start. It doesn't take a public relations genius to realize that the best way to sell the game is to let fans see the best part of the game: playoff baseball. All Major League Baseball has to do is allow fans to see what they want to see: the games.

To the Editor:

I would like to respond to the article about the new security measure Barbara O'Connor, the University of Massachusetts chief of police, is contemplating.

According to the article that appeared in the Daily Collegian on Sept. 30, a high tech security system – with a price tag of a minimum start-up cost of $15 to $18 million to the University is being contemplated. In addition to the initial cost, individual users might be charged $150 to $190 a year for the use of the security system.

I have serious doubts about the effectiveness of the proposed security system. It requires users to keep an electronic device with them at all times. Users activate the device for law enforcement to locate them in time of distress. In my opinion, the system does not really prevent crimes from happening. It merely summons law enforcement to the aid of a victim after crime has already taken place. Chief O'Connor commented about the incident where two individuals were found to shake door handles in an attempt to enter Patterson Dormitory for marijuana.

She was quoted saying that: "There are crimes, that can be prevented by calling right away." I believe, contrary to her conclusion, that the trespassing would be halted but not prevented by using the security system. Her faith in the proposed security measure is misplaced. Further more, the surcharge levied on users of the proposed security system is substantial. It will be difficult to make the security service mandatory to every student –given the current tuition hike students are experiencing, I doubt that students will be too enthusiastic to add another $150 to $190 to their annual tuition bill. If the system is made optional, it might come down to a situation where only those who can afford it can be protected, and those who cannot afford it would be left out in the cold. A security measure that discriminates the poor and offers service only to those can afford it is not a good system.

To truly protect everyone, regardless of whether one can afford it, and to prevent crimes from happening, I am proposing a different security system. It is a no-tech, human-based security system. The stationing of a live person at the entrance of a dorm as discussed recently, is what I believe to be a measure that will prevent crimes from being committed. It is a 24/7 system – ID is strictly required for all those who enter dormitories. Of course, there will be some period of learning and adjustment for students. However, for it to be successful all students have to cooperate. This is a measure I know from my personal experience. It is done very successfully at Barnard College and Columbia University. In my opinion, this is a more effective measure where crimes can be prevented before it happens. The cost of stationing a person at the entrances of 41 dormitories on campus is estimated in another Collegian article to be around $3 million annually.

The total user surcharge for the UMass campus with 24,000 graduate and undergraduate students will range between $3.6 million to $4.56 million. On top of the total user surcharge, the capital cost of installing the security system is between $15 and $18 million.

The comparison in the cost and effectiveness of the two measures clearly shows that the no-tech, human-based security system is the better deal. On a final note, I urge Chief O'Connor to do more consumer research before signing on with Security Products, the company who sells the system. The company has admitted that the system has only been tried on two colleges with much smaller campus acreage, and population (Nazareth College – 4,600 students, and Oswego State University of NY – 8,400 students).

To the Editor:

Three cheers for Frances Carr's expose of the bottled water scam that is being perpetrated upon us.

I would just like to point out two additional aspects of this recent phenomenon. First, In addition to the out-of-pocket cost to us, bottled water comes at an expense to the environment and energy independence. While a clean supply of water is delivered to us from local wells through an efficient system of pipes and taps, bottled water is packed in plastic bottles (made from oil) and trucked for many miles, wasting fossil fuel, generating unnecessary greenhouse gases and contributing to this country's dangerous oil addiction.

Second, clean tap water is not free! We have paid for it with our tax dollars. We should never forget that clean water is a precious and increasingly scarce resource in the world and even here in Massachusetts.

Renowned musical troupe hits Fine Arts Center

By Christine Papadilis
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Four blue lights stream down onto a drum set, set-up right on upper center stage. The background is enhanced and there is a striking red curtain. Fold-up chairs surround the drum set. I sit in the section right smack in the middle of the row, wondering what is in store for the audience.

The president of the Fine Arts Center comes out onto stage to introduce the show and tells the audience that he was able to talk to some of the cast members backstage and they said, "Put on your seatbelt because you are in for an incredible ride!"

The lights dimmed, the audience came to a hush. Cast members entered the stage dressed in all black and continued to sit down in the folding chairs and tune their instruments. Then before I knew it, there were close to 40 cast members up on stage, dancing and playing their glistening instruments. Not only was there simple stage movement, it was full out Broadway style dancing! I was immediately mesmerized by all the different things that were going on during the performance.

Performers twirled batons, spun silver shapes, danced around with beautiful flowing fabric, made shapes with crescent-shaped rods. The list can go on forever. I was amazed with the brilliant way of getting props on and off the stage. They would dance, and use the props to move them around. There was one number where they had two very tall rectangle metal structures. A couple came out and told a love story through their dance, while climbing in, out and around this metal tower. They would drape themselves through, on top, or hang off the structure. It was marvelous!

Timing was a huge factor in this show. Every single movement, note, step, or flick of a wrist had to be absolutely perfect. I did not find any number throughout the show where timing was off. I was particularly amazed with the performers who worked with the silver and crescent-shaped objects. These were used in a way that a baton would be used, with a lot of throwing and spinning in the air and each and every person handling them caught them at precisely the right time.

The music was so pure, crisp and clean. Not one sour note, or misplayed key. There was an additional band on top of a platform in the back of the stage, first unseen by the audience, then not until the fifth piece was this talented band revealed. The selections were well picked. There were a variety of different pieces, from classical and jazz to oldies. Not only were the performers playing the music and the dancers dancing, but I also found that there was a different storyline within each of these pieces. I thought that factor was interesting. It leaves the show open for an audience member to come back and watch the show with a different intent.

Shockwave had a powerful opening and closing number to the first act. It left everyone begging for more. Unfortunately there was a 20-minute intermission – a little too long for my liking because I was anxious for the second act. During the intermission, I spoke with a few patrons who traveled as far as New Jersey to come and see Shockwave. The light started to flicker on and off signaling the audience that the show was about to begin.

My favorite piece was their rendition of "Bohemian Rhapsody" by Queen. At first I did not know that it was this number. There was a saxophone gang entering from stage right looking tough, and then the melody began to congeal. Three men came out playing their instruments wearing pink tutus pretending to be ballerinas. Then at the point in the song where the lyrics go "Mamma oooooo" this large man comes out playing the part as the fat opera singer. It was perfect timing, and turned out to be a very comical number.

My other favorites were "Good Vibrations" by the Beach Boys. There was a lot of audience participation, which was a good second number to rejuvenate the crowd. Following that was the piece titled "Thud, Thud, Thud." It was the tune of the musical score from "Sing, Sing, Sing" except this arrangement was done with all drums. It started off with two guys, then four paying a row of six single drums. Then they rolled out a drum set that resembled a ticktacktoe, with eight drums surrounding this tall square drum holder. Seeing it is the only way to get the full effect of how amazing and talented this drum playing was. It was out of this world.

I have absolutely no negative things to say about this show. If you did not get a chance to see Blast II: Shockwave this time around then I would highly suggest if you ever get the opportunity to go, check it out. It was a high-energy packed, fun, visually and choreographically pleasing show. I give it the highest of ratings and would see it many times over just to be able to see things I did not see the first time around. The stage was always packed with so many different things; one didn't know where to watch. Some of the cast members even came out into the lobby and talked with audience members, signed autographs and shook everyone's hand while thanking them for coming. A perfect ending to an explosive show.

Rock n' roll legend Paul McCartney brings his British flavor to Bean town – and hasn't lost a Beat since the 60s

By Michael DaSilva
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

PAUL MCCARTNEY

BOSTON – As soon one enters the Arena, the mood is immediately set – the aroma of burning incense flows throughout the air in rhythm with a cool breeze. Although Paul McCartney is now backstage, his energy and presence is already felt. It is a type B atmosphere (very Paul McCartney-ish), as everything feels easy going and relaxed. The laidback feel is so calming and comfortable that it almost inspires one to fall asleep. The stage set-up incorporates the serene and peaceful colors of the earth: the curtain is a shade lighter than ocean blue and the screen that precedes the curtain is a subtle green. The blue curtain is filled with white outlined drawings of flowers, vines, and luminescent white and marula circles that appear to be moons – some are lit and others are not. The audience's viewpoint of the stage set-up almost resembles a photo of planet earth from a space shuttle.

The arena is in an almost dream like state; it wouldn't be surprising if angels started to float throughout the air on magical clouds to the sound of church chimes. Music is playing in the background. A light jazz piece one might find in a nearby Cambridge juke joint is migrating from the surrounding speakers and gently making its way into the ears of all who are present. Delicate piano melodies ease the hearts and minds of the otherwise anxiously chatty and giddy crowd. The baby boomers, that consist for what appears to be ninety percent of the audience, is beginning to realize the hugeness of the event. That, tonight live in concert, they are going to see one of the Beatles!!

A metamorphosis is beginning to take place within the mostly baby boomer crowd. The easygoing vibe is erasing the worries and cares of daily life – the corporate rat race. And here tonight, the Fleet Center is like a glitch in the matrix, a hideaway, a temporary escape from it all. Flocking to the Fleet are the CEO's and CFO's of the world, and all of the people who labor and slave away hard week after week, all in an attempt to seek gratification; all in an attempt to be able to financially buy happiness in a vacation, a fancy car, a nice house, a Paul McCartney concert.

So here we all are in this ironic reality, a dichotomy, a paradox. Businessmen and women of the area are arriving by the moment from office buildings alike throughout the hub, to be magically transported in a time machine-sent back to a more innocent time and childhood of the 60's. Yearning to be beamed back to a period when their lives were similar to that of Kevin Arnold's and Winnie Cooper's from "The Wonder Years." When instead of worrying about boardroom meetings and reading and reviewing quarterly reports, their lives consisted of Coca Cola, playing baseball in little league, being a Pop Warner football cheerleader, writing a note to that guy or girl they had a crush on, and oh yeah…dreaming about being in the greatest Rock n' Roll band there ever was – The Beatles. That maybe one day if they practiced hard enough and dreamt long enough, they too might one day be like Ringo, John, George, or Paul. And for many, tonight is the closest that they will ever come…

Yet one can't help but notice the irony in the situation. Where did the message behind the 60s and the Beatles go? Everything that the Beatles were about was rebellion, different styles of haircuts, different ways of thought, going against the grain, freedom, peace, love, fun, a carefree nature and going against the "square" system. And here this same baby boomer generation is, some 30 years later transformed by the same system they once as kids, rebelled against. The money and square-ness of Corporate Capitalism is apparent everywhere from the overpriced foods and beverages to the well polished Fleet Center that once was the broken down Boston Garden; and although it lacked luxury it's fan's hearts were formidable. A Boston Garden that housed all of those great 80's Lakers/Celtics rivalries.

So, on this night in the year 2002, the same generation that followed the Beatles in the 60s and cheered for them on "The Ed Sullivan Show" and bought their albums and dressed like them and even cut their hair like them are hoping that they can tonight buy a slice of that again – an escape from a daunting system and world, hoping to buy a slice of heaven. With the complexities of the modern world we now live in: terrorism, Wall Street crashing, a folded economy, and on the brink of war with Iraq – we need the Beatles more than ever…or at least the closest thing (A Paul McCartney Concert).

I overhear the man seated behind me discuss tonight's magic with his friend. "I was never in a rock band and I never played any instruments. But as a kid, they were just the Beatles!!! You just followed them. I mean, it puts me back and reminds me of sitting in front of my record player. It's an indescribable feeling really." The flocks of fans are now beginning to fill the arena. The smell of beer and popcorn permeates. People are waiting…showtime is approaching when Paul will wave his magic wand and teleport this baby boomer generation to a lighter and carefree time.

Just as I began to think the energy of the night couldn't get any more otherworldly, women dressed in fairytale costumes begin to frolic throughout the audience. Soon enough there are dozens of these theatrical performers on stage: fully equipped with costumes, make up, oversized globes and other props. It is something unexpected, yet thematically courageous. The performers are like Alice in Wonderland meets The Wizard of Oz meets Barnum and Bailey's Circus. The once subtle green screen mentioned earlier is now playing images from all over the

RUNNING with SCISSORS

Episode I: scent sense

By Melissa Hummel and Lizzy Nielsen

Are you a guy who's ever stood at the cologne counter at Filene's and wondered what kind of fragrance suits you? Ever questioned the legitimacy of your wardrobe? Ever wonder what really makes women turn their heads? Look no further, we are here to offer a bit of insight into the female mind and the female nose.

A word to the wise before reading this: cologne does not, by good if you can't operate your shower. It is always a good idea to begin the day clean before you go off and meet new people. This really needs to be applied when it comes to going out to a party or uptown to the bars. No one wants to stand next to the stinky guy, and no amount of cologne can mask the smell of body odor. There is also no substitution for deodorant. Now, we columnists realize that deodorant is expensive, but even if you decide you never ever want to wear cologne, a fragrant deodorant also qualifies as a scent that will make women turn their noses. The column will be devoted to scents, as it is one of the simplest and most powerful things that a guy can wear or not wear that can totally make a woman turn her head. As women there are few things that compare to passing a man and getting a waft of some sweet smelling cologne. We have asked the best smelling guys that we know what they wear and here are our picks for the top five colognes that are most likely to give a woman whiplash.

Number 5: Eddie Bauer

Eddie Bauer is most known for its casual and sophisticated clothing, but they also make a sporty, but sexy men's cologne. It is a solid pick for every day class attending and is sure to get the attention of the girl next to you. Instead of getting out the Old Spice, pick Eddie Bauer, for a small bottle it roughly $40.

Number 4: Cool Water

This is a fairly popular choice for men's cologne and for good reason. There are few women on the planet that wouldn't give a second look or a second smell to a man wearing Cool Water. Casual yet masculine, this is a great choice for smelling good without feeling like you are trying too hard. Cool Water runs a bit more expensive, as it is $47 for a two and a half ounce bottle.

Number 3: Adidas

Another simple, yet head turning cologne is Adidas. Available for roughly $30 for a very small sample-sized bottle, it radiates sexiness without trying too hard. Pick this one up if you're on a tight budget and still care about smelling your best or if you're not too keen on this whole cologne thing but still want to give our advice a shot.

Number 2: Armani

Armani is a scent that will run you a few more pennies out of that check from dishwashing at the dining commons, but is well worth it as it offers a long lasting fragrance that emits class and sophistication and will make any girl take a little more notice. Armani runs around $40 for a two and a half ounce bottle.

Number 1: Curve

This is the ultimate cologne. It smells incredible, it is long lasting, and it fits in a budget. Curve is kind of an outdoorsy scent, but it offers characteristic sexiness for wearing it out at night as well. Curve is guaranteed gamer some compliments and runs about $35 for a two and a half ounce bottle.

A work for everyone's first amendment

What will you do Tuesday night? Homework? Video games? Playing cards with the gang? Why not dust off your first amendment and enjoy the work of some five poets, word-smiths and spoken word artists?

And you will not even need to catch the bus all the way to Northampton to get there. The New World Theater Group, collaborating with Uday Joshi and performance artists Steven Sapp and Mildred Ruiz of the theater ensemble Universes, are bringing Word for word to Amherst.

The open mic series will showcase two presentations, one this Tuesday and another on Dec. 10, both shows starting at 9 p.m. Each show, free and open to the public, is set at the Amherst Brewing Company in Amherst. Another open mic night will take place on Nov. 19 at 8 p.m. at Amherst Books in Amherst.

The Oct. 8 show will include several featured poets including Abrahaim Henderson, Chhaa Thelwell, Jadyie Al Bilali and Dawn Landis Martin as well as a live DJ who will spin between sets.

Young poets from the Amherst community will spotlight the Dec. 10 show geared toward local youths.

"These nights are really for the community of Amherst," said Dawn Landis Martin, poet and press assistant for the New World Theater. "The goal is to get the communities here involved in things such as the Word for word nights and bring on a sense of community."

Following in the tradition of the Nuyorican Poet's Cafe in New York City, which has showcased some of the most interesting poets of color in the country, Word for word hopes to encourage a range of contemporary poetic voices to present their work to the Amherst.

Those with song, prose or rhyme to share or those just needing something to do on a Tuesday evening may find Word for word welcoming and an excellent way to stretch one's mind. Anyone wishing to participate in any of the open mics is encouraged to show up early on the night of the show and sign up for a set.

Indigo Girls pining around in Northampton

By Peter Blandino
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

INDIGO GIRLS
Pines Theater
Sept. 17

NORTHAMPTON – For over a decade now the Indigo Girls have been sharing their brand of rich and beautiful folk music with fans across the globe. On Sept. 17, Amy Ray, Emily Saliers and company brought their soft melodies and socially conscious lyrics to the Pines Theater at Look Park (a five minute drive west from downtown Northampton on route 9). I realized that I was in for a bit of culture shock as a cheerful and enthusiastic crowd consisting of mostly lesbians filled the joint a full hour before the opening band took center stage. This crowd was one of the most loyal and excited that I have ever witnessed.

Prior to the show I had a chance to talk with two lovely fans from the area about the band's appeal and enduring success. Amy Deliefde explained to me that one can relate to the strong Indigo Girls' personal lyrics. Whether male, female, straight, gay, tall or short, it is hard not to be moved by their poetry. Katie Marvici pointed out that the Indigo Girls have stayed true to their roots, and haven't changed their style in hopes of reaching a larger demographic.

As night fell upon the small green nestled within the tall pines of Look Park, K's Choice began their opening set. The brother and sister hail from Belgium and are actually part of a five-piece band, but they could not afford to bring the others along. Sarah and Gert Bettens got things started with a sweet tune marked by impressive vocal harmonies accompanied by two acoustic guitars. This formula continued throughout the set with Sarah singing the lead vocals and occasionally playing harmonica, and Gert occasionally switching to an electric rhythm guitar. The lyrics focused on the fear of being hurt in close relationships, and vulnerability. In what was the climax of the short set Sarah sang, "break my back, my face ... but please don't break my heart." This song was the sole number in the set that had a special touch – that intangible beauty that separates the mediocre from the memorable.

Amy and Emily emerged to be greeted warmly by adoring fans. The two were backed by Carol Isaaschs on the organ. To the crowd's chagrin, they played many songs off their new album, Becoming You. The title track was one of the highlights of the night, with Amy Ray soloing on the harmonica. With the various acoustic instruments from the banjo to the mandolin, Amy and Emily filled the cool night air with a beautiful blend of earthy timbres.

The artistic styles of these two performers mesh into a unique and interesting product, and it is easy to see how they keep such a loyal fan base. But as the set progressed, the music did not. It continued to follow the same formula of poetic and personal lyrics sung over slowly moving chord progressions played by acoustic instruments. For a band that has been making music for nearly two decades variation was certainly lacking. This brought my thoughts back to the discussion I had earlier in the night with Katie and Amy. Although it's good that they haven't "sold out," I feel that the band has failed to evolve out of fear of losing their fan base. Being labeled as "lesbian band" could make it hard for them to break into mainstream popular music. I feel these women have the talent to try something new and succeed, but fear a backlash from loyalists who want them to stay true to their roots.

Despite the fact that he is over a half century old, Paul McCartney can still rock like he did in his Beatles days.

globe; the seven wonders of the world among other images that are shown. It is like a fetishization of all of these ancient and global cultures. Just as the audience's patience begins to wear out and their faces start to look confused, an unmistakable image appears on screen: a silhouette of Paul McCartney with his trusty pumped in the air on a de Rocky Balboa in front of a gumbo-sized guitar. It was as American as can be.

The crowd immediately jumps to its feet like children on Christmas morning. It is too good to be true. There he is, Paul McCartney, looking better than ever. He appears healthy, confident, and most importantly, ready to rock and roll. "You say yes, I say no, you say stop, and I say go, go, go...oh no. You say goodbye and I say hello," and we were underway. Smiles begin to appear on the audience's collective face as if this had just been given free candy. Everyone stars to dance shamelessly, inhibitions are out of the window.

As I look around I immediately find myself in a moment of truth. The magic quality of Paul McCartney is abundantly apparent. The simple stroke of his guitar, a smile on his face, a wiggle of his head is enough to inspire shrieks of hysteria. There is a true energy of love and appreciation for Paul tonight. Signs, posters, flags, and fan memorabilia are prevalent throughout the arena. Tonight is a celebration! A celebration of all that was once good in the world, and maybe could be again.

The biggest rock n' roll star in the world finishes his first song and begins his dialogue. I say dialogue rather than monologue because he gracefully interacted with the audience. "It's great to be back here in Boston, Beantown." He joyously exclaims with a sense of fun and well-seasoned poise. He already begins to control the crowd.

The greatest music catalogue in the history of recorded music continues to be performed live in an amazing and captivating fashion. One of the band members cracks a wise joke. "We have the tough job of deciding when to play a hit song. Do we play it after this hit or that hit, or in the middle of these two hits." All joking aside, Paul's performing voice is still as strong as ever. Still the ultimate musician, he meticulously switches pianos and guitars for the appropriate sound and feel of each song.

After every song that is performed, Paul stops and raises his hands as to signal to the audience a synthol of triumph. The audience loves this and responds enthusiastically. There was a sense of accomplishment about every number performed. Let's face it, these weren't simply songs, this was the fabric of rock n' roll, the beginning of it all, MTV, VH1...the music that inspired nearly every musician since. These were archives and time capsules.

Paul continues to talk with the audience between songs. "I should write a book on massages," he jokes in his famed Liverpoolian accent. "I've had massages all over the world from being on the road and touring. I've had some bad massages too." The 20,000-plus fans hang on his every word.

"One time in New Orleans, the man giving me a massage says to me, 'look into my eyes and try and burn a whole in my eyes with yours. So, I said to him, 'Hey I'm looking for a massage not a relationship'." The simple grace in which Paul handles the audience, humor, and even serious subject matter is an awesome thing to witness.

His talks with the audience and the mood and flow of the show ranged from the silly and fun, to the serious and emotional as Paul discussed his new wife, his deceased wife Linda McCartney and his deceased friends and fellow Beatles, John Lennon and George Harrison. It was a privilege to be able to watch how Paul handled the subject matter. His tributes to George and John weren't sad stops in the show; they were healthy and appropriate times for grieving. And we moved right along into the 9/11-inspired and penned song "Freedom." A flag of the Statue of Liberty was unrolled down from the rafters and everyone became patriotic. The fans sang and clapped in unison, conducted by the voice of reason; Paul; "Freedom, talking bout freedom. I will fight for the right, for freee – dom." It was a site to see.

With the footage of the Beatles, the amazing acoustics, the crowd's energy, the fireworks, confetti, and Paul McCartney's amazing ability to entertain...this was the perfect concert. Memorable moments included; "Can't Buy Me Love," "Eleanor Rigby," "Hey Jude," "I Saw Her Standing There," "Let it be, Lady Madonna," "The Long and Winding Road," "Maybe I'm Amazed," "Something," "We Can Work It Out," "Somebody's Knockin At The Door," and "Yesterday."

After all of these years, he hasn't lost it. His pure love for the music is ever apparent and genuine. It's deeply embedded in his soul and can be sensed when he's playing. The joy that exudes out of his heart is evident on his face while singing, dancing, skillfully playing the guitar or a melody on the piano and cracking a smile on his face. All while doing that famous Paul McCartney headshake – some things never change. He's as alive as ever. Always giving more, he performed a double encore. His last words to the audience, "And in the end, the love you take is equal to the love you make." Straight from the source himself. What more can be said? Thank God for Paul McCartney.

It's official, after rocking the Fleet he's back in the U.S. Will we still need him when he's 64? I'm guessing yes.

seemed like they gained more confidence in the locker room. Our defense just kept hanging in there and they made some great plays. There was a lot of give and take and it was certainly our best effort of the year."

UMass wasted no time in increasing its lead as the very next play was a play action fake that fooled the Richmond secondary, who left Zullo wide open on a post route. Krohn landed a pass on his hands for the 29-yard score. Krohn finished just 14-for-28, but had two touchdowns to just one interception on the game.

"It's easier to play when you're ahead and we hadn't been ahead in a while," Whipple said.

The Minutemen settled back into ball control offense from there on out and let the tandem of Cobbs and Rosario take over the game. That provided a much-needed rest for the Minuteman defense, as the heat at U. of Richmond Stadium topped 90 degrees for most of the afternoon. Still, according to Cobbs, the heat, though intense, could not prevent the Minutemen from their focus.

"We're not worried about the heat," he said. "We're here to play football. We're here to win."

Last week's trip to N.C. State, though it did not provide a positive result in the standings, likely helped the Minutemen mentally prepare for this weekend's flight.

"We've been playing some pretty good people, this is a tough league and we're a young football team," Whipple said. "I saw our guys focused. They knew the routine, they had fun yesterday, which meant they were loose for practice."

Winning at Richmond has been a good omen over the past few years, as Whipple pointed out.

"You look back at the records and since '98, the team that wins at Richmond wins the championship," he said. In 1998 and '99, the Minutemen defeated the Spiders and won the A-10. In 2000, a victory over Richmond helped Delaware to the league championship. And last season, all three co-champions – Hofstra, Villanova and William and Mary – won at Richmond Stadium.

"I tried to tell our kids, this place holds a lot of history," Whipple said. "If you can come in here and get a win, then you're in good company."

UMass running back R.J. Cobbs ran for 112 yards on 17 carries in the Minutemen's first conference win of the 2002 season. Cobbs also contributed two touchdowns, both in the fourth quarter of the 34-13 Maroon and White victory.

Coming together at the right time

RICHMOND, Va. – Things finally seemed to come together for the Massachusetts football team this week in Richmond.

Throughout the offseason, preseason and first four games, there were certain things that UMass fans were expecting to see from their team this season.

New quarterback Jeff Krohn and returning wide receiver Adrian Zullo may have gotten all of the headlines, but knowledgeable fans were looking forward to seeing how former cornerback, and the best athlete on the team, R.J. Cobbs, handled the job at running back. After last year's offensive frustrations, Krohn, Zullo, and the running attack led by Cobbs, had UMass Nation feeling optimistic about the 2002 season.

JIM PIGNATIELLO

The fans were anxious to get a glimpse of new defensive coordinator Tom Masella's system. After all, his was a defense that led Division I Louisiana Tech to the 13th-ranked squad in the nation in turnovers forced, 11th in interceptions. Masella's change from a 4-4 to the 3-4 was a positive one for the Minutemen in a conference steeped in solid passing attacks.

The first two games of the season, a pair of blowouts over supremely outmatched opponents, saw the new faces play relatively well. The defense had some troubles, as young defenses in complex systems are wont to do in a season's early going. The QB-WR combo was impressive at times, frustrating at others. The running backs, first converted receiver Jason Peebler and Rasmny Rosario, then Cobbs and Rosario, impressed against the terrible competition. The pairs went for 100 yards each in both games.

Because of the competition, however, the fans still weren't sure what they had in the backfield, and the defense and passing game still needed some practice.

Game three's 42-17 loss at Northeastern didn't make anyone feel better about the Minutemen. The defense had some good moments, but missed tackles. Krohn was picked off three times, including two returned for touchdowns. The running game was dismantled by a stingy Husky defense. Cobbs and Rosario combined for just 52 rushing yards in Brookline, Mass.

Last week's contest at Division I power North Carolina State wasn't much better. In the 56-24 loss, Krohn was hurried into three more picks, and completed just 13 of his 36 pass attempts. The run ng game was better, but much of that was caused by the Wolfpack's disinterest in stopping a ground attack after they jumped out to a 21-0 lead in the first quarter.

Despite the big score, the defense was actually the bright spot of the contest, putting good pressure on State QB, and Heisman hopeful, Phillip Rivers. The swarming defense showed strong signs of coming along with three interceptions against the D-I opponent.

Now, in what UMass Coach Mark Whipple called the biggest game of the year so far, all the pieces seemed to finally come together. At Richmond, an Atlantic 10 game that the Minutemen needed to win before a pair of tough home conference matchups, the running game was tremendous against a very good defense. The QB-WR combo made plays and the defense as a whole was the team MVP.

Rosario and Cobbs were unstoppable, running for 131 and 112 yards respectively. Rosario's combination of speed and power, and Cobbs' agility and vision were on display.

Krohn found Zullo for a pair of touchdowns and was able to limit his mistakes, throwing for just one interception, which was caused by an incorrect route run by a receiver.

And the defense. Masella's defense did exactly as advertised. It caused five turnovers. The Maroon and White forced and recovered four fumbles and intercepted one pass, giving the offense good field position and ending Spider drives. Even more impressive, however, was the number of times the Richmond offense was in the red zone and came up empty. Time and again, Masella's crew came up with the big play inside its own 20 to turn away another Spider scoring opportunity.

Now, with every remaining game meaning so much and the No. 3 Maine Black Bears headed for Warren P. McGuirk Alumni Stadium this weekend, it seems that the Minutemen are finally firing on all cylinders.

Good news for the UMass Nation.

Ryder lacks good behavior, again

SUTTON COLDFIELD, England – They seemed quite pleasant. But these two elderly women, hidden beneath caps sealed with European blue and gold, shook with resentment.

And in classic British burr, they sneered.

"Dreadful," followed by, "just awful," cursed the air of The Belfry, as pictures of Justin Leonard's infamous 55-foot putt to win the 1999 Ryder Cup at The Country Club in Brookline, Mass., flashed on the massive screens before them.

It was Thursday at this year's Ryder Cup, just 30 minutes into Opening Ceremonies, and vengeful smirks were already popping up. The highlight reel didn't even include the excessive American celebration following Leonard's miracle. But it didn't have to. Despite both captains' pleas for a return of bipartisanship to golf, especially after the Sept. 11 attacks which delayed this event 12 months, "the infamous American raid," as it's been called out here, hadn't been forgotten.

So Sunday, when Irishman Paul McGinley rolled in his "Putt of Gold" on the 18th green to halve his singles match with Jim Furyk and secure the final half-point his team needed to regain The Ryder Cup, revenge was Europe's. There was no repeat of Brookline, either, like the saintly European captain Sam Torrance had promised.

But that's only because this time, the Americans weren't to blame. At this year's Ryder Cup, the Europeans gaffed.

As soon as McGinley's putt dropped, Sergio Garcia hopped, skipped, screamed, hugged everyone in sight, and then bolted down the 18th fairway to embrace Pierre Fulke, whose match with Davis Love III hadn't finished. Sure, The Cup was Europe's to keep, but in this sport of gentlemen, all matches are played to the end. No matter their importance.

It's a shame Love III had to deem the 18th unfit for play, because of the Garcia and Co. party and end the afternoon with Fulke all square. That's not supposed to happen.

That match, actually, would have been crucial had the European fans surrounding the 17th green found silence just 20 minutes earlier during Furyk's birdie putt, a stroke which would have given him a 1-up lead on the 18th tee, and a probable point for America. But a trio of roars during that effort forced Furyk to back away three times, and eventually miss an easy 15-footer.

The problem may have started at the beginning of the week, when official Ryder Cup radios, which went for £8 British Pounds (about $12.55), were sold so fans could follow the action on BBC Radio 88.7 FM, no matter their position on the course. It enhanced the viewing experience twofold.

ERIC SODERSTROM

But Sunday, as Furyk set to putt, the spectators surrounding the 17th green forgot to pull away from the action in their ears.

So when Phil Mickelson missed his birdie try on 16 and gave Phillip Price a chance for the victory, they hollered. And Furyk backed away. Then when Price sank his putt to earn the point for Europe, they hollered. And Furyk backed off again. They hollered once more when Niclas Fasth stuck his second shot on the 18th green, with Paul Azinger in the bunker. And Furyk, one the game's most chivalrous members, pulled up for a final time and just shook his head.

Nothing happens in isolation on a Ryder Cup Sunday, so Furyk would have heard the screams from the 16th and 18th greens, but they would have been bearable. When you're standing over one of the most important putts of your life, and 10,000 people, standing no more than 25 feet away from you, unexpectedly scream in unison, it's a tad distracting. If they do it again, it's frustrating. And after a third time, it's just confusing.

Never have I seen anything like it. It was worse than the Brookline blunder. Jose Maria Olazabal may have had one break in concentration when the Americans stormed Leonard, but Furyk was stopped three times, in what could have extended the match and given the United States a good chance to get to 14 points and retain The Cup.

I don't blame the fans for getting excited. If it were the other way around, I would have cracked. But not when the green was clear in front of me. I would have clenched my fists. Gritted my teeth. Closed my eyes and counted to 10. But there is no way I would have bellowed with a European player ready to putt.

The matches weren't over, yet. It's just too bad that after Furyk's miss, they were.

Still, for some reason the media, everywhere, have failed to recognize this ordeal at 17 as a crucial part of the American defeat. It seems like after the blitz on Brookline, and the September tragedy, everyone just wanted these Cup matches to end in Cupcake delusion.

In The Times, England's major daily newspaper, one reporter wrote that it "was a Ryder Cup for the fans who showed considerable restraint...Their decorum helped to reestablish it as a true sporting contest."

Sure, there were no hecklers, no drunken savages, no crazy Bostonians running wild. But on one of the most important shots of the weekend, there were three decent attempts to break the sound barrier. Come on, you can't ignore that.

Garcia wasn't an angel, either. Twice in the Saturday afternoon Fourballs, he embarrassed Europe, jumping on the back of Lee Westwood after his partner's drive to the 10th green, and then slamming his club to the ground and kicking his bag after losing the match on the final green. You can't forget his victory sprint up the 18th fairway, either.

I'm not trying to make excuses for this year's loss, or the unrest in 1999. I'm just asking for some perspective. What happened at Brookline, and what happened here in Birmingham are similar occurrences. In both cases, mistakes were made and players were distracted.

Still, the Associated Press is still running stories on how courteous and sportsmanlike The Belfry's galleries were. "The Europeans did more than win back the famous gold trophy last week at The Belfry," it reads, in a story written this Saturday, six days after the fact. "They restored dignity to the matches..."

"No one screamed until the golf balls were in the air. No one shouted vulgarities at the Americans. Most importantly, no one lining the fairways of The Belfry had a beer in his hands...The result was a crowd that was passionate and partisan, but still courteous and fair."

No alcohol on the course always helps. Congratulations to the lad who finally figured that out. But that doesn't give the Europeans angelic status. They're just as guilty as our Yanks were three years ago.

Just maybe this time, there's no whining about it. Maybe this time, the losing side has understood the uncontrollable Ryder Cup atmosphere. The fact that during Ryder Cup week, there are times when, before you realize what you're doing, you've already made the mistake. And you can't take it back.

There will never be a Ryder Cup that ends with smiles on both sides of the ocean. There's just too much on the line. Controversy is entertaining. It's electrifying. It's enough to get two 70-year old women screaming at video highlights. And as long as putters aren't thrown, there's really no reason to whimper.

Maybe that's why Furyk didn't find gripe with the gallery. He realizes The Ryder Cup's fanatical setting, and the fact that it's just golf. If Furyk complained, it would have been post-Brookline all over again, for the next two years.

And that just would have been embarrassing.

UMass tangles UR in web

By Matt Brady

RICHMOND, Va. – Road wins are hard to come by, especially in conference games against opponents with a strong history of winning at home. And in the Atlantic 10, road wins are often the determining factor in who is atop the conference at the end of the year.

"Anytime you win in this league on the road, you have to be happy," UMass Head Football Coach Mark Whipple said.

The Massachusetts football team (3-2 overall, 1-1 Atlantic 10) marched into Richmond Saturday likely needing a win to stay alive in the postseason hunt. The Minutemen used five Spider turnovers – four fumbles and one interception – to propel themselves to a crucial and lopsided 34-13 victory.

"It feels good to get a win on the road," junior linebacker Jeremy Cain said. "We haven't won on the road since 2000, the last game of the season against Rhode Island."

"This was as good a win as we've had at UMass in a while," Whipple said. "We haven't played this well on the road in a long time."

Richmond's vaunted ball control offense – a system that uses many different sets in running the option – was for the most part ineffective in the contest. Fullback Claude Diggs, who for much of the day ran over and through the UMass front eight, fumbled the ball twice for the Spiders (1-3, 1-1 A-10) while his cohort Lee Williams put the ball on the ground once himself.

"It's [the linebackers'] responsibility, the option," Cain said. "We said we had more speed with all those linebackers and we just did our responsibility and we stopped them."

For the third time this season, the Maroon and White saw two of its running backs go for more than 100 yards in the same game, as redshirt freshmen R.J. Cobbs (112 yards, two touchdowns) and Raunns Rosario (131 yards) turned the trick for the second time this season, the first coming against American International College three weeks ago.

"I really give credit to my O-line," Cobbs said. "It was a hot day and they put in a lot of effort for us today. The whole week we were just worried about rushing defense, and we knew how good Richmond's was and our line knew that they had to get the job done, so I just want to give all the respect to the line."

The offensive line, which last week lost O.J. McBride to injury, has been a question mark all season but turned out rave results against a Spider defense that sported two preseason First Team All-Atlantic 10 selections in seniors Adrian Archie (four tackles) and Mark Thompson (seven).

"I think you have to credit the line," Whipple said. "We're young up there, we have two freshmen playing – but they're just coming together. It was solid all the way through. Everybody's going to come after [junior quarterback Jeff] Krohn, so if we can run like we ran today, it will give the offense good balance."

The Minutemen scored on their first drive of the game as Krohn hooked up with senior wideout Adrian Zullo for a 30-yard strike, but the Spiders held them to a 10-7 lead at halftime. Then, on the opening kickoff of the second half, Richmond returner Kenny Dantzler took the ball out of the end zone and was hammered by sophomore Bobby Boyer, forcing a fumble that was picked up by Brandon Brudzinski.

"It was a great play on the kickoff with the fumble and the offense answered," Cain said.

"The heat was taking the energy out of us," Whipple said. "It just

The Massachusetts defense held the Richmond offense to only 65 total yards in the second half of the Minutemen's 27-7 victory Saturday. With the win over the Spiders, UMass is currently 1-1 in the Atlantic 10.

Mass Attack exhibits its potential versus X-Men

By Andy Vogt
COLLEGIAN STAFF

A casual observer perusing the box score of the Massachusetts hockey team's 3-2 loss to St. Francis Xavier (Canada) might groan and think, "here we go again." After all, the Minutemen opened the 2001-02 campaign with a 5-3 exhibition loss to the X-Men en route to a disastrous 8-24-2 year, a season in which Head Coach Don Cahoon's troops accumulated only three Hockey East victories.

But then again, this is a much different Massachusetts hockey team.

"Last year, after the game we were a little embarrassed, I don't think we played at all with them," senior captain Tim Turner said. "I think today at times we were dominating, and that's a confidence booster for us."

Sporting a roster of 25 underclassmen, the youthful Minutemen were a bit sluggish coming out of the gates, giving up two scores in the first 13 minutes. Cahoon described his team's play in the first frame as "scrambled eggs."

But UMass turned on the jets in the final two periods, mounting numerous scoring chances and outshooting the X-Men 28-14 over the last 40 minutes.

"Winning the game was certainly an objective, but it's not as central as the development of the team," Cahoon said.

The Maroon and White's top line of Turner, freshman Stephen Werner and junior Thomas Pock clicked almost immediately in the offensive zone and combined on a nifty play to record UMass' first tally of the game. With the Minutemen on a man advantage, Pock squeezed a feed to Turner through the pinching X-Man defense, and the captain fired a shot on netminder David Haun that rebounded right to the rookie Werner. The heralded recruit from the U.S. National Development Team was Johnny-on-the-spot, as he easily deposited the biscuit past Haun, cutting the Minuteman deficit in half.

For a line that Cahoon said only played in practice together for two days, the triumvirate showed quite a bit of the potential to cure the offensive deficiencies (2.06 goals/game) that plagued the Minutemen last year.

"I really like the line and I hope they keep us together, because we gelled," Turner said.

"You've got two experienced players, and then you have Werner who obviously brings a lot to the table," Cahoon added.

The third-year coach also addressed the scoring woes of the Minutemen, but expressed optimism that the trend would soon be over, despite scoring only two times in the exhibition.

"If we get into that, it will be very worrisome considering what a problem it has been scoring goals," Cahoon said. "But I think we had many more scoring opportunities [than last year's game]."

UMass' other score came late in the third period, as Michael Mullen took a pass from teammate Peter Alden and rifled a shot just under the crossbar to bring the Minutemen to within one goal.

The goaltending for the Minutemen, one of the big issues entering this season, was shaky at times against the X-Men, but brilliant at others. Sophomore Tim Warner, the successor to departed backstop Mike Johnson, played solidly for the Maroon and White after allowing a breakaway goal to St. Francis Xavier's Todd Norman and a fluke goal that caromed off an X-Man skate. Warner made seven saves on the afternoon in just over 32 minutes of action.

Freshman Gabe Winer made 11 saves during his 26-minute stint, and shut down the X-Men until Patrick Grandmaitre cut towards the net and backhanded a soft shot that trickled through his five-hole. But his post-to-post stoning of Shawn Snider on a two-on-one break early in the third period showed why the Stoughton, Mass. native was named All-New England during his senior season.

Michael Waidlich, the other Minuteman goaltender for this season, did not see any action in the exhibition, despite Cahoon's previous hopes of giving playing time to all three of his netminders.

"As much as [he] is still in the hunt, I decided to go with those two guys to get ready for the first game of the year," Cahoon said.

UMass was also without the services of several other players due to injury, including the team's other captain, senior defenseman Kelly Sickavich, as well as freshmen Chris Capraro, Matt Anderson and Stephen Jacobs.

"We've got some other players that we know can play, and they'll be in the mix," Cahoon said. "Some guys helped their chances tonight, and other guys probably didn't."

The Minutemen open the season on Oct. 13 with a tough Hockey East matchup against Boston College, but with two non-conference contests against Rensselaer and Nebraska-Omaha to follow, the month of October will be used primarily to evaluate the talent and prepare for the grueling conference schedule.

"Nothing is set in stone," Cahoon said.

Construction nearing completion

University closing on several projects

By Dan Lamothe
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Multiple construction projects are underway at the University of Massachusetts and under various stages of completion.

Two large-scale steam line projects are under way, leaving detours in several locations on campus. The steam line project running through the Morrill Science Center has closed traffic on the main staircases and sidewalks running in between the Morrill buildings from N. Pleasant St. to the base of Orchard Hill. The project's price tag is estimated at around $830,000.

"We anticipate completion of that project in about 45 days," John Robinson of the Facilities Planning Division said.

The other steam line project has also seen substantial progress since the beginning of the school year. The parking lot on N. Pleasant St. across the street from the Fine Arts Center has been transformed several times as the project nears completion, affecting both automotive and pedestrian traffic on N. Pleasant. St.

"It went into a temporary parking lot into its final stage," Robinson said.

Robinson anticipates the large steam line project, estimated at $4.2 million, to be complete in the next 30 days or so.

Workers have also begun the construction of a new Engineering Lab building on the north end of campus near the new computer science building and the Polymer Research Center on Governor's Drive. The project will cost $25.9 million and is scheduled for completion sometime around now next year.

Resurfacing and maintenance construction to the Campus Center Garage is also still underway. According to Robinson, the project, estimated at $2 million, is progressing on schedule.

"The work was substantially completed as advertised," Robinson said. "The heavy work was done in time for school to start. Work to specific members [pillars] scattered within the garage will be completed around Thanksgiving."

Renovations to Benzanson Recital Hall in the Fine Arts Center are nearly complete as well, with a new lobby added and improvements to the hall being made.

"Benzanson is pretty well complete. They'll have their grand opening in a few weeks, and they're planning on using it later this semester," Robinson said.

One project that has lagged somewhat behind schedule is the addition of an elevator, estimated at $1.2 million, in Arnold House. According to Robinson, workers ran into several problems working in Arnold because of the age of the building.

"We ran into the 'it's an old building, look what I found' [scenario]," Robinson said. "It's also difficult working in a building that is fully occupied."

Robinson anticipates completion of the Arnold project in about 30 days.

Improvements to a temporary lab space in Goesmann Lab are underway as well. Workers are renovating four labs in the building for chemical, civil, and environmental engineering purposes at a cost of $1.5 million.

"It should be done by December," Robinson said.

The University is also spending $5.2 million on sprinkler systems in Herter Hall, Tobin Hall, and the Lederle Graduate Research Center.

"The sprinklers should all be done by Christmas," Robinson said. "The work in Herter by and large is done. We don't anticipate 100 percent completion until Thanksgiving. The project is pretty much right on schedule."

Improvements to the Physical Plant building have also been made. According to Robinson, replacement of the heating, ventilating and air conditioning (HVAC) system in the building is complete and a remodeling of the third floor there is just underway.

"We anticipate completion early in the spring," Robinson said. "Probably some time in March."

Facilities Planning has already seen the completion of several large projects this semester. The construction of a new $15 million wing of the Isenberg School of Management was completed several weeks ago and is already in use. The addition has four large classrooms, breakout rooms, a computer lab, and a student center.

In addition, the new million dollar privately funded soccer field, Rudd Field, is also open and fully operational and McGuirk Alumni Stadium underwent structural repairs, costing the University $880,000.

Construction on a new engineering building is underway and scheduled for completion in October of 2003. The building, located on the north end of campus, has a $25.9 million price tag.

Forum addresses relations with Iraq; raises questions

By Hirak Shah
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

A public forum was held last night in Hasbrouck Hall with four expert speakers on hand to discuss America's potential involvement in a war with Iraq.

The forum was held during and after President George W. Bush's address of the nation. Moderator Gerald Epstein, co-director of the Political Economy Research Institute at the University of Massachusetts, interrupted the address, saying that he could not hear the President's address. After an outburst of applause, Epstein said, "Most of us probably don't want even want to hear the President speak."

Epstein then read some poll results from the NY Times regarding the mood of the American people in regards to Iraq.

The first speaker, Daryl Kimball, executive director of the Arms Control Association, said that Iraq has always been a problem. He said in 1991, Saddam Hussein signed the treaty promising not to make nuclear weapons, but continued work on an atomic bomb and other weapons of mass destruction. During the Gulf War, Iraq had a stockpile of biological and chemical weapons that they used on Iran during the Iraq-Iran conflict.

He continued, saying that there is great debate on Iraq's capability. "The UK and US paint the worse-case scenario," said Kimball.

He said there needs to be a more thorough weapons inspection process because right now, no one has an idea about Iraq's weapons. The intelligence from the U.K. and U.S. gives no new information.

Kimball said that action is needed, but not immediate military action. He believes the right course would be to "strengthen U.N. weapons inspection."

He also said that inspectors need full account of intelligence from other countries, access to Iraqi scientists, and full access to all weapons sites, including presidential palaces. To avoid war, Kimball believes there needs to be cooperation among three parties: the U.S., the U.N. Security Council, and Iraq.

Professor David Mednicoff, a legal studies professor at the University, tried answering two questions during his presentation: Is a war started by the U.S. against Iraq legal under international law, and is a war started by the U.S. against Iraq prudent in international law and the post-9-11 context of the Middle East?

Mednicoff answered the first question with no. He cited Article 2, Section 4 of the U.N. Charter on the use of force by states. The article's intent was to prohibit use of force by one country. Also, the UN Security Council has mandates for maintaining international peace and security. Mednicoff said that the U.S. can cite Iraq not getting rid of weapons of mass destruction under section 687 of the treaty that ended the Gulf War to use force now.

According to the professor, one problem that could arise with the U.S.'s legal claim to invade Iraq is the term "reactivation," derived from U.N. Resolution 660 that was put into place after Iraq's invasion of Kuwait.

"The conflict between Iraq and Kuwait is over, and there is no evidence of actual Iraqi use of force against another state," Mednicoff said.

Mednicoff also said that a war with Iraq would not be prudent in the post-9-11 world and Middle East. He said that one country using force on another would be a dangerous precedent and undermine the U.N. system. He also said that the U.S. is not very popular with the Middle East, and that invading Iraq will anger the Middle East even more and will lead to more bad blood between the Muslim world and the U.S.

The next speaker, Anita Dancs, research director for the National Priorities Project, discussed the economic aspect of a war with Iraq. She said that initial estimates of the cost of a war are close to $100 billion, or roughly five percent of the Federal Budget. She said that this is

Lecture series to begin tonight with Middle East

By Bridget Henry
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The 67th annual Springfield Public Forum Series begins this evening at 7:30 p.m. in Symphony Hall with a talk entitled "Terrorism in an Age of Globalization."

Co-sponsored by the Union News and Sunday Republican, the forum begins with a discussion led by Fareed Zakaria, a distinguished authority on United States foreign policy and the Middle East. Zakaria, who has spoken with audiences in the U.S. and abroad, is the co-editor of the American Encounter: The United States and the Making of the Modern World and the author of From Wealth to Power. His current project is a book entitled The Future of Freedom, to be released in April of 2003.

At the age of 28, Zakaria became the youngest managing editor in the history of Foreign Affairs, the leading journal of international politics and economics. He was named editor of Newsweek International in 2000, and also contributes stories and columns to Newsweek and the Washington Post.

Zakaria received his B.A. from Yale and his Ph.D. in political science from Harvard, where he taught international politics and economics and was responsible for running "the Project on Changing Security Environment." He has also been an adjunct professor at Columbia and Case Universities.

The next scheduled forum event is a discussion led by New York Times personal health columnist Jane Brody. The talk, titled, "Slimming the American Waistline" will be held on Tuesday, Oct. 15. In addition to her syndicated column for the New York Times, Brody has written a number of magazine articles and books. She frequently lectures on health and nutrition and has appeared on both radio and television shows throughout the country. Brody has also received numerous awards for journalistic excellence, including an honorary doctorate from Princeton University.

On the following Thursday, Oct. 24, diplomatic correspondent and writer Marvin Kalb will give a talk entitled "Journalism in the Post-9/11 Era." An authority on public policy, Kalb served as Chief Diplomatic Correspondent for both CBS and NBC News, and was also the moderator of Meet the Press. For twelve years, Kalb was the Founding Director of the Center at Harvard's John F. Kennedy School of Government, where he also taught and lectured as the Edward R. Murrow Professor on Press and Politics. He is currently serving as the executive director of the Joan Shorenstein Center on the Press, Politics, and Public Policy in Washington, D.C.

Egyptologist Mark Lehner is scheduled to present an illustrated talk entitled "History of the Pyramids" on Wednesday, November 6th. A resident of Milton, Massachusetts, Lehner is the originator and director of the Giza Plateau Mapping Project, which studies and maps the site of the Giza Pyramids. He is expected to talk about his work uncovering the remains of a royal urban production center dating back to the time when the Giza Pyramids were under construction 4,500 years ago.

Lehner's discussion is part of a larger event that includes the Springfield Art Museum's year-long "Ancient Egypt" pyramid exhibition, and the Springfield Symphony Orchestra's presentation of Verdi's opera, Aida, which will be broadcast live throughout New England by WGBY and WGBH.

The Forum concludes on Nov. 20 with a discussion led by writer and historian Michael Beschloss. Beschloss, whose area of specialty is the U.S. Presidency, will give a talk dealing with his newly released book, The Conquerors: Roosevelt, Truman and the Destruction or Hitler's Germany. Beschloss, who holds degrees from Williams College and Harvard University, has written a variety of books on the presidency and American politics.

Familiar to PBS viewers as a regular contributor to The News Hour with Jim Lehrer, Beschloss also appeared in a two-part documentary on Dwight Eisenhower, as well as in the PBS documentary, "The Kennedy's."

9:38 a.m.: A caller reported an incident from the previous night in which an intoxicated male attempted to hit her.

3:12 p.m.: A caller in Brown Dormitory on Eastman Ln. reported that a lava lamp and a TV were taken from the room some time during the morning.

8:20 p.m.: Gerry T. Carlone, 20, of 118 Spring Glen Rd. in Niantic, Conn., was arrested for liquor law violations and charged with possessing liquor while under 21 years of age and carrying a false ID card.

8:35 p.m.: David M. Connors, 20, of 593 Winter St. in Holliston, Mass., was arrested and charged with possessing liquor while under 21 years of age.

Sunday, Oct. 6, 2002

1:37 a.m.: A medical emergency in Johnson Dormitory on Thatcher Way was reported. An Amherst Fire Department arrived on the scene and transported one person to Cooley Dickinson Hospital.

2:19 a.m.: A disturbance involving four individuals was reported on the north side of Washington Dormitory on Fearing St. An officer reported that it was a verbal dispute and that it was dispersed.

9:17 a.m.: A report of vandalism in Lot 33 on University Dr. was called in. The passenger window on a vehicle was smashed in, the driver's side front tire was slashed, the hood was scratched, and the entire passenger's side of the vehicle was keyed.

12:25 p.m.: A custodian reported that he discovered a window smashed on a State vehicle in Lot 41 on Commonwealth Ave. yesterday morning.

12:26 p.m.: An area residential director reported that some time between 4 and 5 a.m. someone took the seats off of 12 bikes that were on the bike rack.

2:20 p.m.: A report of a burglary near Alumni Stadium was reported. The passenger window was smashed, with the stereo, amps, and speakers missing. The wires were left hanging.

8:44 p.m.: Students reported to Housing that a trash barrel was started on fire outside of McNamara Dormitory on Eastman Ln. Environmental Health and Safety was dispatched.

11:05 p.m.: A medical emergency was reported in Crabtree Dormitory on Eastman Ln. The subject was admitted for evaluation at Cooley Dickinson Hospital.

11:36 p.m.: The Amherst Fire Department called to notify that they were en route to the Mullins Center practice rink for a medical emergency.

Authorities searching for killer in Washington

By Bernadette Simpao
U-WIRE (DC BUREAU)

(U-WIRE) WASHINGTON – The shooting of a Spotsylvania County woman Friday has been linked to the same gun used to kill at least four of the six victims in the series of sniper shootings in the Washington, D.C., area, authorities said Sunday.

"The forensic evidence has shown us that their shooting is linked to the Montgomery County shootings, linked to the D.C. shooting," Montgomery Police Chief Charles A. Moose said of the Virginia case.

Investigators continued their search Sunday for the elusive sniper responsible for killing six people in Montgomery County and the District, and the first funeral was held for one of the victims, Prenkumar Walekar, 54.

Police are urging residents of the Washington area to be vigilant, and to raise their doubts of people who appear suspicious.

"We remain convinced that someone in our community knows who's engaged in this," Moose told reporters. "[Someone] is aware that they haven't been around, is aware that they have been acting differently, that they have altered their schedule, that they may be gloating."

Authorities have taken a former North Carolina man into custody in Fairfax County, Moose said. Robert Gene Baker III, formerly of Raleigh, was reported missing but is now in custody on an auto theft warrant from Florida.

Moose said Baker is not a suspect in the sniper killings in Maryland and the District, but added that authorities are talking to him. No weapons were found in Baker's possession, Moose said.

Five people were shot and killed during a 16-hour period from Wednesday night to Thursday morning, and the sixth victim was killed in Washington Thursday night. Investigators said each victim seems to have been shot at random, and all were shot only once, leading authorities to deem these acts sniper attacks.

Authorities are waiting for ballistics reports from the other two Maryland shootings, and are expecting a psychological profile of the killer from the FBI. So far, 600 credible tips from more than 2,500 calls to a hot line are being pursued by 100 police investigators and 50 federal investigators.

Police are also searching for a white box van, which a witness saw leaving one of the shootings. It appeared that two males were in the van, a six-wheeled vehicle with a bent rear bumper and black letter on its front and sides.

"Whoever is involved in this madness, rethink what you're doing," Moose said at a press conference Friday night. "Turn yourself in. Surrender to law enforcement."

Authorities have offered up to $50,000 for information leading to the shooter's arrest and indictment.

The shootings began Wednesday afternoon when a shot was fired through a window at a Michaels craft store, in Wheaton, Md., but did not hit anyone.

The first murder occurred at 6:05 p.m. on Wednesday, when 55-year-old James D. Martin was shot in the parking lot of Shoppers Food Warehouse in Wheaton.

The second shooting occurred at 7:41 a.m. Thursday, when James L. Buchanan, 39 and the son of a retired Montgomery County police officer, was shot while mowing a lawn off Rockville Pike, a main thoroughfare in Montgomery County.

Prenkumar Walekar, a taxi driver, was killed while pumping gas at a Mobil station in Wheaton. A caller reported his death at 8:12 a.m. Thursday.

At 8:37 a.m., Sarah Ramos, 34, was shot at a post office near Leisure World, a retirement community in Wheaton. It was at this shooting that a witness reports seeing a white van leaving the post office parking lot.

Lori Ann Lewis-Rivera was reported shot at 9:58 a.m. in a Shell gas station in Kensington, Md., where she was vacuuming her car.

On Thursday evening, around 9:15 p.m., Pascal Charlot, 72, became the only victim killed in Washington and the only one shot at night. He was taken to a hospital, but died less than an hour later.

"more than four times the budget for international spending, and three times the federal spending of K-12 education. One hundred billion would be enough to cover all uninsured kids for 5 years."

According to Danes, other consequences include a rise in oil prices, more problems with the U.S. and deficit spending, and the possible driving up of the interest rate.

Michael Klare, Five College professor in peace and world security studies addressed the U.S. military plan. Klare believes that a war will start by the end of November, whereas most experts believe it will happen by the end of January.

Klare claimed, "The timetable is being driven by the plans of the war."

He also said that the U.S. wants to quicken the pace so that they will not lose support before the U.N. gets more involved and thwarts the U.S.'s plan.

Klare said that the U.S. wants to try a new innovative approach to war using speed, information, and technology. He said that they want to get rid of Iraqi President Saddam Hussein and his advisors as fast as possible and worry about Iraqi ground troops later.

The Five College Program In Peace and World Security Studies (PAWSS) and the Political Economy Research Institute (PERI) at the University co-sponsored the forum.

EDITORIAL/OPINION

We don't create news; We report news

Minorities are the only people that commit crimes at the University of Massachusetts.

The Collegian has never once said, written, implied, insinuated, signed, advocated, expressed, printed or even supported this statement. And yet, we get phone calls.

Many of our sleep-deprived, baggy-eyed, burnt out, overworked and underpaid staff members are forced to sit on the wrong end of the receiver as someone complains about how it's unfair that we run police authorized composite sketches of minorities and don't balance it out with an equal number of Caucasian suspects.

And our dedicated staffers, yes the ones trying to balance school, newspaper and life, still manage to politely inform the caller that we can only print the composite sketches that the police issue us.

We are a newspaper. Our job is to inform the students, professors, workers, parents, children and people of this community of the news in a timely and accurate manner. When a crime occurs, we look into it, uncover the facts, report on them and present them to our readership.

Readers have called and asked a number of questions, including some of the following.

Why aren't there drawings of white criminals on the front page?

We haven't received an official police sketch of a Caucasian crime subject since September 25, which we ran on the front page. We can only print the sketches that we receive as official "public safety alerts." We can only print the releases from the police and not sketches that readers obtain for us.

Your staff simply is not diverse.

True, if the multitude of majors, classes, religions and ethnic groups that litter our employee roster do not qualify as diverse. We welcome any writer who is interested in joining our staff. This newspaper is only comprised of people who have come down to our offices looking to write, not a group that we have gone out and hand selected.

We cover the stories that we deem meaningful and newsworthy for this campus and the surrounding community. We are not a mudslinging tabloid.

Our writers take their jobs seriously. This means they won't go out and attempt to excavate information about a white crime suspect, simply because there hasn't been a sketch of one on the front page in a few weeks. Equally, we do not look to report solely on crimes committed by people of color. Instead we take each story on a case-by-case basis and report on them as severity dictates.

At the same time, we are not ignorant. We understand the reactions and outcries our work might cause. The news is the news; we don't create what happens, we simply report on it when it does.

Every single news day we make conscious and intelligent decisions about our content. We will continue that process as we have in the past, with the best interests of everyone in mind, as well as the underlying importance of truth and accuracy.

Job Hunting 101

LINDSAY LISENBY

All right, now, I fully understand that there are about 25,000 students on this fine campus. I also know that about 75 percent of them are seeking employment somewhere, whether it be a receptionist at the Whitmore Administration Building, a retailer at a boutique in town, or a food server at the Blue Wall. Therefore, I am very aware that the odds are not in favor of a job-seeking individual making it past the application stage unless a court order or a very tight relationship with the employer is provided. I do, however, find it very hard to accept. Of all the student-run businesses on campus, proprietorships, franchises, services and offices operating out of the many buildings we walk by everyday, why is it so difficult to find a place to make the money necessary to function comfortably as student here?

If I were one of the fortunate students who are able to make it through the school year without any fiscal difficulties, I wouldn't have a problem with the lack of employment opportunities on campus. Instead, I am one of the many students who dread that pesky little Bursar's Office letter in red and black ink that comes conveniently at the peak of vacation season in the summer and a few short weeks after Christmas in the winter. Watching your life savings completely disappear with a one check signature is enough to inspire you to work like a dog to keep ahead for the rest of your life. It doesn't sound too hard to do, but when there isn't a way of replenishing it before your lovely group of friends proposes an activity that requires you to contribute more than $5.00, you tend to panic and call your mother to beg for money. But, again, if you're like some, she doesn't have the money to send you. A single mother raising three kids on a secretary's salary doesn't have much excess money to put into a college fund for her oldest and brightest. Anyway, I could never ask my mother to pay her EFSA determined Expected Household Contribution when it means cutting back on what she would otherwise spend on the house mortgage or my brothers' school clothes. It's my dream, after all; don't take it out on them.

In basic business and economics classes you learn about the job market and unemployment. In fact, you really don't have to be taught; it's easy enough to understand. In a place like this, there is a very high demand of students who need work-study or extra cash. Even better, there are some who just need an activity to put on a resume to convince the outside world that they did something in college other than go through their entire AIM Buddy List checking each and every Away Message because they have three hours to kill before the bars open up in town. Don't deny it; you know you do it, too. When you hear statistics saying that the unemployment rate is low and there is a plethora of jobs out there for everyone willing to look, they aren't talking about the UMass job market.

The first week of school, a friend – who is in the same predicament – and I went to the Auxiliary Services Office in the Campus Center to check out the job openings board and pick up some applications. We got there and had to wait in line behind about thirty other hopeful students to read the listing, which only contained about ten open positions. We picked up applications and brought them to their corresponding employer. Each and every time, we got the same answer—"the position has been filled", or, "you are not available for the hours we are hiring for." It's all right. I can take rejection. There are plenty of other jobs out there, right?

Unfortunately, no, I'm sorry, there aren't. When your job pool capability spans only as far as you can walk or take a bus, the outlook does not look good. No matter what your qualifications are, the odds are against you. Fifteen other people with just as much experience as you with grades just as good as yours have already applied for the job. Unfortunately, the person interviewing you rarely makes the connection that there is no bigger motivation to do a good job for the sake of money than necessity and deprivation.

The starving actor always gives a better performance, but that's not what you would say when they throw the, "What can you do for this company?" question at you. Don't get me wrong, there were some places we tried in our vast search that were hiring. If you're willing to do telemarketing, there were some openings at the Alumni Fund. In only a few short phone solicitation classes, you could be selling a dream Boiler Room style to families just like yours by panhandling for money in the name of education. My conscience and my pride forbid me to do such a task. I'd rather scrub the dried blueberry cobbler off the wall in Franklin Dining Hall with a toothbrush. I would have applied there, actually, except I have class during most mealtimes and when I am free, I usually like to eat – but, the shortcomings of scheduling is another topic for another day.

Another place that was hiring was the Campus Security Office. You know who they are, right? Those people who sit and do their homework while they guard the door and occasionally ask for your ID. There's a possibility that that job could be for you if you're willing to risk your life every night by telling the wrong person that they can only sign in four guests, not five. I'm sure there haven't been many run-ins with trouble for those dedicated individuals, but I'm not the type to sit alone by myself in the middle of the night asserting authority to people whom I would otherwise walk as far away from as possible if I saw them on the street. I may sound picky to you, but there is a reason why these aforementioned positions are available in such a market. Think about it.

Anyway, with all the problems students face throughout their day –exams, homework, construction detours, giant holes in the road that could consume a Honda Civic, rape suspects at large, and, God forbid, internet malfunctions – financial security should not be one of them, especially if they are willing to work for the money they need. Everything you have learned in economics and sociology has told you all about the trends in class distinction. There is a reason why most children of lower class families don't go to college and therefore remain low class—they can't afford to do otherwise. However, many of us have been given the chance to change that, if we could only find an opportunity to convert our willingness to succeed and our impressive employment histories into enough cold hard cash to get a degree.

We are all at college to define where we want to be later on in life, or at least find some answers to lead us in the right direction. If we were to face the type of job market when we graduate as we have here in the Five College area, not many of us would be here. I, for one, would be taking night classes at Bunker Hill Community College, because, after all, why bother doing any better when minimum wage isn't even hiring? The only reason for gutting it out here through all the bills and the semesterly "Account Balance = $0.23" is that we just might have a chance to surpass in the future where we would be if we had stayed home, become a secretary and spent our life savings on a pre-owned car.

Every time Campus Design and Copy turns you down or Wal-Mart doesn't call you back, just smile and think of the sports car you'll be driving when you reap the benefits of your investment in higher education and where it put you in the job market at the end of the road. At least, that's what I tell myself when I have to scrounge my pockets for change for a coffee at Dunkin Donuts.

Don't let your mother read this

COURTNEY CHARLES

Admit it. You think about sex. You think about it a lot. Everybody does. But not as many people are willing to discuss it openly. But I will. I have no shame. This is my column, my open forum for as much sex talk as I want to give.

I know there are people out there who may find this column offensive, in poor taste, or even tacky. So if you're not open to sexuality, read no further, but don't claim that I advocate free, unprotected love, because this isn't what it's all about.

This column is meant to be fun and enjoyable, as is fully protected sex between two consenting sober adults. I'm not advocating casual sex, but I'm not the biggest fan of commitment either. So if you're curious about the sexual side of college life, then by all means, read on.

It's true that if a girl goes out looking for sex, she gets it. More of us should really consider becoming players.

I'd compare the booty life for the average girl here at UMass to the fine lunch buffet at Pizza Hut. You can keep going up for more, there are all sorts of varieties to try, and if the meat on one piece is not good enough to fill you up, then just try another.

It's also true that being a player is more fun. I'm a junior now and for my first two years at this fine institution, named UMass (which makes me think of getting some ass) I tended towards the monogamous relationships. Well honestly, that was a waste. Now I've smartened up and realized that college and monogamy are seriously incompatible.

I've done away with the ball and chain yanking and complaining to me about who I'm with, why I never came home the night before, and if my gay friend who sees me in my Vicky's lingerie is really homosexual. I'm thankfully through with the feeling of duty, at least calling a boyfriend once a day.

To be sure, I'd rather have my own time for quiet personal thought and reflection. Or maybe to just stare at the shirtless pictures of Josh Hartnett and Eminem I have posted on the ceiling above my bed. I have plans to install a full-length mirror up there too.

But seriously, if I can't get the celebrity men that I desire, there are oodles of men in the fine Pioneer Valley area. See, I have this philosophy that freshmen equals fresh meat. That in no way prevents me from making catcalls to the more pathetic ones wandering the streets late at night when I cruise by with my girls.

On a dare last Wednesday, I tied a red negligee around my neck for a cape and ran over to my neighbor's apartment and proclaimed myself as the booty princess. The males on the floor congregated there, took it all as fun and I now have a free dinner each week courtesy of my girls for the rest of the semester.

I have this competition with this guy I know. We basically make prank calls to people on campus to see how long they'll talk to us when we poll them with our own pseudo-surveys. The guy calls people and starts asking them about their dorm bathrooms.

I call and ask them about sex. Surprisingly, most people were willing to talk to me. Here are the unscientific things that I've learned: guys notice the face, bust, and bum of a girl the most, most people have never had sex in public, but some favor getting wild in their kitchens on the table or counter.

One guy living in Southwest told me he was really aroused when a girl has nice healthy pink gums, but I believe that was somewhat of an abnormal response.

I asked one of my roommates the other day if she thought I was a nymphomaniac. She turned to me and replied, "You ask that as if it's a bad thing."

Oh well, it's fine as long as my mother remains unaware of my carnal desires. Moving me into my apartment she did find my Kama Sutra book, and I believe she chose not to comment in order to avoid embarrassing everyone.

No doubt the rent checks would have stopped coming if she had caught sight of my KY and toy handcuffs. Not to mention my ribbed, studded and colored array of condoms, cause you know anyone with a clue knows those textured ones are the good stuff.

But to be honest, I'm a big girl now, and can do whatever I want within the legal limits. And truthfully, there's nothing I like more than to shake my J-Lo booty and D-cup boobies to my afternoon class and think about putting monogamy off for another decade.

Letters to the Editor:

To the Editor:

We were appalled to read the 'Will Guns N Roses rise again?' article that was published on the 2nd of October in The Daily Collegian. The first issue that aroused our attention was Samara Marbelstone's 'little theory' pertaining to the essence of Guns N' Roses.

It is clear that Marbelstone feels that the original line up is more important than the music, however Marblestone fails to understand that all things evolve; Guns N' Roses is just a label to package the music and if this new line up feels the same musical vibe that the original line up does then we say let the music live on. Marblestone like so many other false fans is lost in an image talking more about the 'Slash's puffy black hair and dangling cigarette' than the musical genius of the band. In countless interviews ex-band mates have always said that Axl Rose's main objective in Guns N' Roses was to make his lyrics come alive through the music, not through the image.

It is important to understand in the multi year hiatus the direction that Axl wanted to take his music has changed. Because the music has taken on a new style Axl surrounded himself with new talent. Who can deny that Buckethead or Brian Mantia or Tommy Stinson are not musically talented. Axl will always surround himself with an All Star line up; he just wouldn't have it any other way.

We question Marbelstone's true devotion and credibility in criticizing the band, when she makes such statements as "I expected to see not only the lead singer, but also the guitarists Slash and Izzy Stradlin...drummer Steven Adler." Any fan of Guns N' Roses knows that Steven Adler left the band after the Appetite album, and eventually sued the band. The rest of the band hasn't been in contact with Axl in years. Axl wouldn't even allow them to appear at the New Years Las Vegas Show last year.

The fact that the band is stilled called Guns N' Roses lies in Axl's legal rights to the name, which allows him to sing the old songs. When Marblestone says Axl's new band will fail and that he shouldn't even be attempting to recreate the success, we question his understanding of how Rock & Roll has developed. Music is in Axl's blood, as it is in most Rock & Rollers. Look at the Rolling Stones who have played for 40 years. Music is in them, and they continue to rock because as Keith Richards put It: "next to heroin, being on stage is the next best drug." What If Muddy Waters or BB King gave up because they attained legendary status? It sounds like Marblestone would want you to think that once a musician has achieved such a status, and fallen out of the public image – they should call it quits.

Fans should stop living in the past – appreciate what once was – but understand that music is always changing. Newer fans should do themselves a favor – listen to some of the new songs, and tell us it still isn't better than the crap being mass-produced and sold now-a-days. Tell us that on power ballads like the new "Madagascar" Axl doesn't still shine. Tell us that the new band isn't just as tight as the classic line up. Remember – the Illusions albums took years to come out, because Axl was and always will be a perfectionist.

Wouldn't it stand to reason that if Axl Rose has been working on this new album and is still not willing to release it – It must be something out of the ordinary? The man doesn't put out crap to make money – he does it for the love of music. That's what Guns N' Roses was about, and still is about.

To the Editor:

Taxes, education, healthcare, abortion and the big dig, what do these all have in common?

They have all been issues in the past two gubernatorial debates. But what aren't the candidates discussing? I will give you a hint; it's what brings 12 million visitors to Massachusetts's forests and parks every year. It's what provides us with clean drinking water, clean air to breathe and beautiful fall foliage.

You guessed right, the environment has been a neglected issue. As a Massachusetts voter and Environmental Policy student, I have been trying to educate myself about the candidates for governor and what I have found is that, there has been a lack of attention paid to environmental issues by the media and by the two major runners, Republican Mitt Romney and Democrat, Shannon O'Brien.

There are pressing environmental issues that need to be recognized and addressed by the candidates. For example, the 44 acres of land that are lost to development each day, and the destruction of old growth forests on Mt. Wachusett to make way for new ski trails. And, what about the construction of a huge conference center at the base of the highest peak in the state, Mt. Greylock.

We need to make protecting our forests and parks a priority for the gubernatorial candidates. As students and voters in Massachusetts, we need to demand attention paid to issues that we want addressed. Here is a suggestion, drop the candidates a line, and let them know you want the environment to be a primary issue in their next debate. You can also, sign MASSPIRG's five star forests and parks petition, which will be sent to the candidates. The MASSPIRG five star pledge is one that urges the gubernatorial candidates to protect forests and parks in Massachusetts from development, and to manage them in an ecologically sound manner as well as provide positive recreational opportunities for visitors.

Development of these public lands alters wildlife habitat, takes away from recreational activities such as hiking, biking and camping, and destroys old growth forests which in turn destroys the biodiversity of the area. Student volunteers will be in the Campus Center gathering signatures during the next few weeks. MASSPIRG forests and parks campaign will also be hosting an Awareness Hike next month. If you are interested in volunteering, please visit the MASSPIRG office in room 423A in the Student Union or call 545-0199.

Exploring Medieval merriment

ARVER, Mass. – Hear ye, hear ye. You've got about two weeks left to attend one of the largest renaissance festivals in New England. The 21st season of King Richard's Faire is now underway and producing much mirth in its wake. Which village idiots made the rule that those who attend such festivities are anti-social sci-fi freaks? To these lowly curs, I cry, "a pox upon your nether areas, fiends of all things ancient."

By Jessica Pelletier
Collegian Staff

But seriously, Oct. 20 is the last day to join in on one of the most incredible outdoor festivals east of the Mass Pike. King Richard has been greeting his subjects for decades, and he wants you to join him! Shows run constantly from 10:30 a.m. until 6 p.m. any of the 10 stages found throughout the fair's perimeter. The level at which some people go to keep the authenticity of wandering through a town during the time of Shakespeare is incredible. Sunlight filtered down through the rows of fir trees and the haunting melody of a hand carved flute hang over the scene in memory of a now obsolete way of life.

Dressing yourself in the clothing of renaissance royals is not mandatory – although once I'd arrived, it looked like it would have been fun. Random folks had dressed up in clothing ranging from those of English peasants to French aristocrats and even Germanic tribesmen. Children's costumes can be purchased as well, in case your prince or princess wants to look the part.

Various shops line the streets upon entering. The Apothecary was a personal favorite of mine. Dried herbs, spices and tea cover the walls and isles of its wooden frame. Spices as common as cinnamon and as exotic as witch hazel can be purchased by the bagful. Other shops purvey corsets for the ladies and leatherwork for the more ruggedly inclined.

Tickets must be purchased to buy any food on the grounds, and even the victuals are authentic. Lower classes in England referred to their pork as pigge, and so does the Canterbury Kitchen. For the sake of boring background information, it was the French occupation of England's throne during and after the time of William the Conqueror of Normandy that used their language to call their meat porc. Eventually everyone else began to use it as well.

For those readers who are of the age of 21 and older, a variety of alcoholic beverages can be purchased on the grounds as well. Why not wash your pigge sandwich down with a flagon full of mead and watch the knights' joust for the entertainment of the king and his subjects. More quick facts: mead is the result of fermenting honey, as opposed to the barley and hops found in beer. Although I wouldn't know first hand, I'm told it's worth the money.

A large wooden castle stands at the far end of the fair grounds and showcases the history of torture devices in Europe. This dungeon of hell gives a graphic view of human suffering to anyone willing to spend a couple extra dollars for the fun. We were told the show was meant for children as well, but a dragon roasting a marshmallow over the coals, which are causing mice to bury into the stomach cavity of a victim, isn't as family friendly as imagined.

With the exception of the evening joust, there is always a choice of five or more free shows to view at any given time. On my particular afternoon trip, I viewed the falconry of a group called KnightHawkes, the Tale of the Tiger, the fire-eating juggler Thomas Wood and the Joust to the Death. Gypsy dancers, a human chess game, comedians Puke and Snot and a round of Irish ballads and stories are only a fraction of what goes on within the giant wooden walls.

So if you do intend on being present for a day of 'magical merriment,' bring your wallet. Adult tickets are $22 a person, and children get in for $11. And speaking of children, bring 'em if you got 'em. There's an entire area set aside for children to play games, go for rides and see some shows geared towards their age range.

To review: great food, awesome entertainment and the ability to dress up in a costume prior to All Hallows Eve. What's not to like? Taking route 495 south to 58 north and following the huge signs will take you right to the grounds where the parking is free and the historical hilarity is timeless.

Hannibal the Cannibal returns to the big screen yet again

Silence of the Lambs prequel chills audiences as much as its predecessors

By Johnny Donaldson
COLLEGIAN STAFF

RED DRAGON
Directed by Brett Ratner
Starring Anthony Hopkins, Edward Norton
Ralph Fiennes and Emily Watson
Playing at Cinemark 12 in Hadley

The camera swoops in on a symphony orchestra in full operative mode, zeroing in on a flutist mangling his part of the suite. It then pans into the audience, focusing on a face – one not much different from those surrounding – separated by the eerie shiver of familiarity and anticipation. It is the face of the world's most beloved cannibalistic serial, Dr. Hannibal Lecter, and we see that he's none too pleased with the flutist's playing. It's only a matter a time before the offending musician is on the menu at Lecter's society dinner party.

So begins Red Dragon, a creepy and sublime rehash of the Hannibal Lecter story. It returns Anthony Hopkins to the role for the third time, but this fourth Lecter movie is actually the first to introduce the urbane monster. It's a prequel acting as a sequel, adapted from Thomas Harris' first novel, which has already been made into one movie: 1986's slick and stylish Manhunter, which launched Michael Mann's impressive screen directorial career and featured a pre-"CSI" William Peterson as a FBI investigator tracking a killer with the help of the just imprisoned Lecter.

Retired FBI agent Will Graham (reinterpreted by Edward Norton here, doing nice work in a role that has been made even more one-dimensional) is the one responsible for landing the famed Chesapeake Ripper – soon to be renamed "Hannibal the Cannibal" – in jail, only after nearly losing his life to the good doctor. Graham has a gift that made him special in the Bureau – he had an ability (Intense imagination? Complete and total empathy? Psychic prowess?) that allowed him to enter the minds of those he was chasing and think like them. After Lecter's capture, the emotional toll became too much for him, and he left for the Florida coast with his young family. He is lured out of retirement to help on a lurid case that is stumping his superiors.

Two families – one in Atlanta, and the other in Birmingham – have been ritualistically slaughtered by a serial killer tabloid-dubbed "the Tooth Fairy." Calculating the timeline of the murders, investigators have figured that they have a three-week time window to find the killer before he commits his next set of murders. Slowly, Graham finds himself being drawn into the psyche of the murderer – and into the orbit of Lecter, who Graham is uneasily consulting with on the case.

The role of Hannibal Lecter was beefed up from the original sources; he appeared in only 11 pages of the original novel of Red Dragon and only in about three or four scenes of Manhunter (where he was played with frightening understated menace by Brian Cox.) Hopkins, by now, has the role down – the velvet-soft burr, lined with undercurrents of needling mockery; those eyes, glistening dead orbs, that stare in stone cold focus; the exact movements of the body. Gone is the almost cuddly Hannibal Lecter of the gruesome Hannibal; back is the dry-witted, sophisticated and deadly forensic psychiatrist from The Silence of the Lambs.

Missing from this version are the elements that made Manhunter a cult classic: the Petersen performance that reflected just how many mental landmines there are to climbing inside a killer's head; the family scenes that humanized the thriller proceedings. Here instead we get a fine Norton performance, plus superb casting in all the roles; a fully fleshed out cast of supporting characters (something even Manhunter lacked); a twist ending that is conventional but craftily staged and a musical score that remains unobtrusive (unlike the Mann film.)

It was a brilliant idea on the part of director Brett Ratner (taking baby steps away from the world of Rush Hour) to rehire the brilliant Italian cinematographer Dante Spinotti and Silence production designer Kristi Zea. Spinotti's work on Manhunter was visually cool, suggesting wide-angled emotional alienation. Here he returns to the look of the 1991 Oscar winner, with Zea recapturing the dank, creepy feel of Lecter's dungeon cell. Also working wonders to fuel our sense of deja vu – the return casting of Anthony Heald, memorable as the evil Dr. Chilton that was doomed in Silence of the Lambs.

For much of the first hour Red Dragon seems like it will be a stunningly well-crafted, but psychologically shallow retread until Ralph Fiennes and Emily Watson show up. Fiennes is Francis Dolarhyde, the shy, intricately tattooed object of Graham's search. Fiennes gives an intensely developed performance – at turns skin-crawlingly frightening and sadly vulnerable and scared. Dolarhyde's romance with plucky blind co-worker Reba (a swell Watson) is touching, even though, yeah, these kids won't have much in the future.

The original Silence of the Lambs is a classic for a reason, and the love it/hate it Hannibal still remains in the mind just for it's outrageous gore quotient. I liked that film, a disturbed and disturbing Grand Guignol black comedy. Here the revolting shocks are hidden off camera – Ratner adapts a style of implication rather than over exaggeration. At least Hannibal Lecter will be happy – rather than a skeletal commercial bone; there's enough meat on this thriller to chew on.

Unique exhibits in Southwest gallery put new spin on traditional art

By Cameron J. Woods
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

The Hampton Art Gallery located in Southwest premiered Sally Curcio's Hair Trigger and Amy Margaret Corey's Baggage: Claimed on Sept. 19. While roughly a dozen people showed up for the initial unveiling of the two art exhibits, both will run through Dec. 8.

Hair Trigger proves to be a bit more unique than most exhibits found across campus, for it showcases sculptures constructed from human hair.

Curcio's exhibit contains three different pipe pieces with hair flowing out of them, two picture frames with hair pressed between the glass and about 10 different bars of soap that appear to be sprouting hair.

The sculptures were met with an array of responses from the crowd.

"It is a great visual just to see the hair coming out like that," said Jon Black, University of Massachusetts student.

Another bystander mentioned liking the intense, delicate two flat pieces of artwork, as each looked reminiscent of African masks.

Others, though, were less enthusiastic.

"That is disgusting – probably the grossest artwork that I have ever seen," said Shanon Brady, UMass student.

Curcio explained why she chose such an abstract medium.

"Personal waste is hidden in so many ways, yet collected in common repositories," she noted. "The result of this marginalized collective activity is exposed in this installation as it brings one into a space where the debris has been made visible."

Corey, formally trained in Art History and Fine Art, said of her exhibit Baggage: Claimed, "I have returned to the things I loved as a child – the needle work of sewing and crochet. These arts have a history with the women in my family and with women in general. Returning to this traditional needlework was a homecoming for me. I have finally found a way to combine my love for traditional women's art with my passion to sculpt."

Corey's exhibit shows an array of handbags mounted on different backgrounds. She chose to display handbags because they are only made large enough to hold only the smallest, most necessary or treasured items; a key, a credit card, lipstick. Corey attributes partial inspiration for her work to Van Eyck's Virgin and Child with Chancellor Nicholas Rollin, a painting that originally contained a huge money purse hung from Rolin's hip, depicting his power. It was later deemed necessary for censorship and was painted over.

"In essence, I want to join the long line of fiber artists who have come before me," said Corey. "This exhibit is my fledging attempt to claim and make my mark on a small part of this tradition."

Both Curcio's and Corey's exhibits are brought to the Hampton Gallery by The Incubator Project, which, under the leadership of Anne LePrade, brings art exhibits to UMass that otherwise would never get the chance to be displayed on campus.

"We want to expose people to art forms that aren't the norm – to expand their perception of what is 'art'," said Ms. LaPrade.

So to those who appreciate abstract and/or more conventional forms of art, Hampton Gallery is now showcasing an example of both. Even those en route to Munchies and More or the convenience store could just stop a minute to take a look at some very interesting expressions of artistic talent.

Defending their territory

Deren's five goals lead offense; defense shines

By Mike Marzelli
ASSISTANT CORRESPONDENT

It is said that as tough as it is to reach the top, it is even tougher to stay there.

As defending Atlantic 10 champions, the Massachusetts men's soccer team knew that teams would be gunning for it this year. Having completed the non-conference portion of its schedule at 4-4, it also knew there were things it needed to improve on if the Minutemen hoped to begin their quest for a repeat on the right foot namely tightening their defense, finding a consistent number one goalkeeper and generating enough offense to run with the high-powered offenses around the league.

Mission accomplished

Enzo Altomare and the UMass defense shutout offensive-minded Xavier, 2-0, on Friday, and Jeff Deren's four goals led a high-octane attack which wiped out Dayton, 5-2, on Sunday as the Minutemen surged ahead in conference play with a 2-0 record. Throw in a character building scuffle and an acrobatic flip on a throw in by freshman Ernie Billittier and you have the makings of a highly successful weekend for Head Coach Sami Koch's squad.

"It's a good feeling. It definitely gives us hope, our backs aren't against the wall...and I think this is a good stepping stone for us," Koch said. "We just have to keep building from this. Now that we're 2-0, teams are really going to be gunning for us. We need to keep building...to win the Atlantic 10 championship."

The conditions at the rain-soaked Rudd Field on Friday called for defense, and Altomare and the UMass defenders provided just that. After senior left Deren put the Minutemen ahead at 14:10 by taking a pass from classmate Yuri Morales and hursing a shot from a nearly impossible angle, the defense buckled down and controlled play for most of the afternoon.

JEN MAHONEY/COLLEGIAN
Jeff Deren scored a career-best four goals against Dayton.

Altomare made two sprawling saves and three overall to keep the Musketeers off the scoreboard as he hopes to solidify himself as the number one keeper.

"Enzo's really stepped it up," senior Derek Rhodes said. "He takes it to heart that he wants to win the spot outright, and he's definitely showed that he deserves to be there."

While UMass clung to its defensive style to maintain its slim one-goal advantage in the second half, it received a huge boost from an unlikely source as senior Tiago Moreira tallied his first career goal after taking a pass from Push Myers and lobbing a shot over the charging Musketeer goalie at 51:00.

"Tiago's goal was crucial," Koch said. "He had a couple of great goals when we were in Canada, and he can finish – he can put balls in the back of the net. The timing was perfect, it was really what we needed, especially when we didn't get that third goal on the other chances."

As UMass continued to control play, tempers flared in the 62nd minute as a scuffle ensued between the two teams, which resulted in a red card for UMass sophomore Martin Burwell. Although forced to play the remainder of the match a man down, the incident served as a rallying point for the Minutemen as a strong sense of team unity was displayed in defense of their teammate.

"It's just an unfortunate situation to have a guy kicked out of the game," Koch said. "Everyone was there supporting Martin; supporting the fact that it was a late hit on their guy. It shows that we're together as a group."

With a scoring chance from the combination of Myers and sophomore Oral Bullen having gone by the board despite several rebound chances in front of the net, the Maroon and White again reverted to defense to secure its second consecutive shutout. There was much to be pleased with in terms of both the performance and results for the Minutemen, according to Koch.

"It's the opening game of the conference, and we got the 'W,' so you have to be satisfied with that," he said. "They moved the ball well; they're a good team. When we were a man down, we played especially well making sure they didn't get any shots.

I don't think they had a good shot.

"I was very pleased with the defensive work, very pleased with the guys that came off the bench. I thought the starting group did a good job...and it was a good all-around performance by everybody."

With Dayton paying a visit to Amherst on Sunday, again the focus was on the defense as it hoped to slow forward Chris Rolfe and the Flyers. However it quickly became the Jeff Deren show for the Minutemen.

The reigning Atlantic 10 Player of the Year tallied four goals, becoming one of only eight UMass players in history to do so. The four-spot gave him seven in his last four games, as UMass improved to 2-0 in the A-10.

Deren, however, credited his teammates for allowing him to put forth such a fine offensive effort.

"It was an unbelievable team performance," Deren said. "Every ball I had, it was just me being in the right place and a teammate putting the ball on my head. I could have just let it hit me and it would have gone in."

Despite the offensive accolades being heaped on Deren, it was actually Yuri Morales who opened the scoring at 11:44 off of a brilliant sidestep and pass from junior Dan Colwell. Deren would then take over, receiving a feed from Morales and smoking a chip shot past the diving Dayton keeper at 16:47. He would not look back.

After heading in his second goal at the 48:51 mark off a beautiful cross from Ernie Billittier, Deren again found the back of the net at 58:00 off of a Colwell assist. However, what was his first career hat trick would become his first career four-goal game just 27 seconds later, as he hooked up with Myers for his final goal.

"Push just played a ball over the top," Deren said. "I was sitting far stick. I bent my run to the post, and then I just hit a header to put it in.

"It just seemed like a special day. This isn't something that comes around all that often, but when it does, you have to take advantage, and we took full advantage of everything," he continued. "[We] couldn't have planned for anything better."

UMass' consecutive shutout streak ended at 72:46 when Rolfe tallied the first of his two late goals for the Flyers, but the play of Altomare and the defense was again encouraging and the overall team effort allowed the coaching staff to insert some substitutes for valuable game action and experience.

"Toward the end we had a lot of subs in and we wanted to give some guys who don't get a lot of playing time in and get them some game experience," Rhodes said. "If someone...takes a red card or something, we need guys off the bench to come in and play well."

All in all it was a great start in the Atlantic 10 for the Minutemen as they hope to repeat as champions.

"It's a great feeling for the A-10 season, especially the way we started," Deren said. "We had an unbelievable weekend. This is never an easy trip for anybody to play these two teams, and the way we played them was unbelievable."

CHRISTIN HULL/COLLEGIAN
Goaltender Enzo Altomare and the Minutemen have allowed just two goals in their last three games.

Coach Koch liked what he saw from certain players in areas of concern and hopes the momentum from these two victories will carry over into next weekend as the Minutemen face a tough road trip.

"I knew we were going into this game having played better. Chris Camerota has done a great job [on defense] back there – he's been tremendous. Derek Rhodes has done a great job, and Jason Golesky, when we took him off, we still hadn't given up a goal yet," Koch said. "I really appreciate the job they're doing in front of Enzo, which makes Enzo's job so easy. He knows what his limitations are, and he's playing within his ability."

UMass will face La Salle on Friday in Philadelphia at 3:30 and will travel to The Bronx, N.Y. on Sunday for their 1:00 tilt with Fordham.

"We're in good shape. We're playing with confidence," Koch said. "It's a hard place to play La Salle, and Fordham's a hard place to play. More than any other conference, playing on

Minutewomen split in Ohio

After being knocked out of contention for a conference playoff spot in 2001, it was only appropriate for the Massachusetts women's soccer team to begin where it left off.

The Minutewomen (2-7, 1-2 A-10), behind freshman Lindsay Bellini's third goal of the season, exacted retribution over Xavier in the form of a 2-1 victory on Friday afternoon. But Head Coach Jim Rudy's squad could not complete the Buckeye State sweep, as it fell to Atlantic 10 powerhouse Dayton 1-0 on Sunday afternoon.

UMass	2

Still, after dropping last Nov. 4's contest to the Musketeers in Amherst, the Minutewomen were more than happy to return the favor on Xavier's home field.

"Our point of view wasn't so much revenge oriented, but rather that it was appropriate that our second season this year started with Xavier," Rudy said.

Against XU, UMass rebounded from an early deficit to pick up its first conference win of the season. Xavier's Melissa Clavier put home a header off a Tracy Veith corner kick to give the Musketeers a 1-0 lead, but UMass' Michelle Luttati responded with her first career collegiate goal knotting the teams at one before going into the locker room.

Through a steady downpour and high winds in the second half, caused by the remnants of Hurricane Lilly, the Minutewomen were able to put home the winning goal in the contest. In the 59th minute, the Maroon and White's own Hurricane Lilly (Erin, that is) threaded a pass to Bellini, who deposited a shot past Musketeer goalkeeper Megan Veith for the deciding tally. Bellini, a preseason All-Atlantic 10 Rookie selection, has recorded all three of her scores in the past three UMass games.

"Someone's going to get the goals, and we don't really care where they come from," Rudy said. "I think in the long run, Bellini will serve more goals than score them. That's more of her style."

Despite being rescheduled from 7:00 p.m. to 1:00 p.m. due to the storms coming into the Ohio Valley, the weather still played a major factor in the game.

"Thank goodness the Xavier people had the foresight to play it when they did," Rudy said. "By the time we were finished, it looked like Syracuse." UMass' game against the Orangewomen on Sept. 27 was washed out at halftime after a torrential downpour pelted the Syracuse area.

The Maroon and White's Kelli Nigh made eight saves on the afternoon, while Veith turned aside four Minutewoman shots for the Musketeers.

Against the Flyers on Sunday, however, the Minutewomen could not develop a steady offensive rhythm, as they were outshot 27-5 in the game and registered only two chances on Dayton netminder Stephanie Weisenfeld. But despite outshooting the Minutewomen by almost a five-to-one margin, Dayton only managed to record six shots on goal. Still, Shannon Kuhl's header past Nigh four minutes into the match proved to be the only necessary offense for the Flyers, as they picked up their eighth win of the season.

"Defensively, Dayton was very good," Rudy said. "They really played us physically, but our kids responded well."

The Minutewomen return to action this weekend, as they continue their quest for an Atlantic 10 playoff berth. UMass will clash with LaSalle at Rudd Field on Friday at 3:00 p.m., with Fordham coming to town on Sunday for a 1:00 p.m. start.

Streak runs to 11 for distressed UM

Standing alone nearly 50 feet away from her squad, Massachusetts Field Hockey Head Coach Patty Shea thought to herself, "How could this be happening?"

Her team, a group of young but energetic athletes trying to use the "there is no I in team" philosophy, had reached rock bottom.

It took nearly ten minutes for Shea to gather her thoughts and approach the Minutewomen after their 1-0 loss to No. 19 Syracuse Friday night. She had a lot to say, and for the first time all season the frustration was waning in full force.

This weekend the frustration was apparent among the players and coaches of the field hockey squad as the loss to Syracuse and a disastrous 8-0 defeat to No. 3 Wake Forest Sunday gave the Minutewomen a 0-11 overall record.

"What is really frustrating is that the players stopped believing in what we are successful at, and they tried to change it," Shea said. "We are not making smart decisions. We are not taking the 100 percent risk."

On a rainy and foggy Friday night at Richard F. Garber Field, UMass looked as if its first victory of the season would come in upset fashion against the No. 19 Orangewomen.

The Minutewomen held strong against Syracuse's strong offensive attack and played right alongside the Orangewomen – ending the first half knotted at zero with SU.

"We took five steps forward in the first half," Shea said.

But as the Maroon and White has been doing all season long, the steps it took forward were negated by poor decisions and a lack of aggressiveness in the later part of the contest.

"We took major steps backwards in the second half," Shea said. "We stopped going to the ball and attacking the goal and it absolutely killed us."

The passive play of UMass directly resulted in Syracuse getting a one-goal lead – just enough to put the Minutewomen away. In the 53rd minute, Syracuse forward Brittany Carriero split the UMass defense untouched by a defender and blasted a shot past goaltender Christine Tocco.

"Our defense continued to back up instead of attacking," Shea said. "You can't score if you don't attack the ball. In the first half we attacked and we got corners and we got shots."

The attempt to carry the positive aspects of the Syracuse game into the game Sunday against the third-ranked team in the nation, Wake Forest, failed for the Minutewomen as they endured their fourth shutout in a row. Wake Forest trounced UMass, 8-0.

Massachusetts was killed by 19 Wake Forest shots in the first half leading to a 5-0 halftime lead. The dominance of the Demon Deacons continued into the second half, as three goals were scored on the UMass cage.

The Minutewomen were unable to create momentum throughout the affair and Shea is perplexed as to why her team is lacking any sort of success.

"We tend to get bored with what is working and we think we need to do the spectacular," Shea said.

UMass will test its luck Wednesday in hope of getting its first win of the year when it travels to Rhode Island to face Providence in its last tune-up before the Atlantic 10 schedule starts this weekend.

"We need to be creative on the field but only in the appropriate areas, not the middle of the field," Shea said. "That's where we get into trouble."

SGA to convene tonight

Senators to discuss committees

By Kristin Shrewsbury
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Student Government Association will meet tonight to discuss committee assignments and chairs, as well as coordinating the structure of the Senate.

The SGA Senate met for the first time a week ago, and is looking to have an even larger senator turnout this week. Newly elected members were sworn in and promptly given directions to the edict and functions of the Senate.

Power to make change, and getting involved were some of the key topics covered by members of the SGA, and were reinforced by Director of Legal Services Charles DiMare. DiMare explained the SGA Wellman Document, which describes the SGA's rights in regards to their actions within the University of Massachusetts.

Other changes made by the Senate were the direction in which Speaker Dan Saunders is hoping to lead the Senate. He explained to Senate members that he wants researched motions, and more importantly to debate over any and all motions brought before the Senate.

"Every committee needs to function in order for us to work," Saunders said. "Feel free to debate motions, we're not going to rubber stamp every motion as we have done in the past. I want a lot of dialogue so that everyone knows what we're doing."

Saunders also shocked former members by explaining that he plans on cutting off repetitive announcements as well as prolonged speaking by members of the Executive Cabinet and Senate.

"I talked with President Carr and the rest of the Executive Cabinet and they were in agreement with my decision," Saunders said. "I think some were shocked, but in a good way."

Tonight's meeting will announce the various committees and the senators' placements on them. Popular committees among the Senate were Ways and Means and University Policy. Ways and Means handles the $1.6 million SGA budget, and in turn allocates those funds to every Registered Student Organization (RSO) budget. The University Policy committee deals primarily with issues within the campus and areas in policy that students would like to see change, such as the Student Code of Conduct.

"We have enough diversity in how people view issues, left wing, right wing, conservative, liberal and so forth, that every committee will be well represented and foster some good motions and debate," Saunders said.

Saunders added that he hoped to get the Administrative Affairs committee on their feet to help get new potential Senators into the SGA. While the SGA holds 72 Senatorial seats, only 17 papers have been taken out to contribute to the only 46 Senators it currently holds.

"We've had 17 new people come and take out papers for vacant seats," Saunders said. "Our first meeting seemed really good, and now we're just looking to get a hold on the committees and really start looking at what the Senators want to do with them."

Other committee's encompassing the Senate are the Finance Committee, which allocates emergency funding to RSO events and material needs; and Public Policy and Relations, which is in charge of press releases and publicity regarding the Senate. A Diversity committee used to be the sixth committee within the Senate, however Saunders decided not to fill the committee.

"I think it's a waste of time and we need to have diversity within every committee we have on the Senate," Saunders said.

Congress discusses using force on Iraq

WASHINGTON (AP) – Congress on Tuesday began a fateful three-day debate on authorizing President Bush to use force to disarm Iraq's Saddam Hussein. If forced into war, "We will prevail," the president declared.

"I want to thank members of both political parties for realizing the seriousness of this issue," Bush said as debate opened in the House.

"At this moment, the people's house begins debate on one of the most difficult questions we will ever face," said Rep. David Dreier, R-Calif.

Both the House and Senate hope to conclude by Thursday night, with expectations they would approve a resolution providing the president wide latitude to take military action to disarm Saddam of chemical, biological or nuclear weapons and, if possible, depose the Iraqi leader.

Anticipating an overwhelming vote of support in Congress, Bush told a Knoxville, Tenn., rally on Tuesday, "Military option is my last choice, the last choice. But should we commit our military, we'll be ready. We'll be prepared. We'll have a great plan and make no mistake about it, we will prevail."

Secretary of State Colin Powell, meeting with lawmakers on Capitol Hill, said the congressional resolution "will definitely strengthen my hand as I try to do the diplomatic work up in New York to get a United Nations Security Council resolution" requiring unimpeded weapons inspections in Iraq.

Powell said there was increasing support at the U.N. for a new inspections mandate. "All of my colleagues at the United Nations and others I've spoken to around the world clearly see the threat," he said.

In a somber address to the nation Monday evening, Bush said the threat from Iraq was unique and imminent and there was no time to wait for final proof that Saddam had developed a nuclear capability, "the smoking gun that could come in the form of a mushroom cloud."

"While there are many dangers in the world, the threat from Iraq stands alone because it gathers the most serious dangers of our age in one place," the president said.

Bush told a Cincinnati audience in his televised speech that Saddam was "a homicidal dictator who is addicted to weapons of mass destruction," and that if he succeeds in obtaining nuclear weapons to add to his biological and chemical stockpiles, he "would be in a position to blackmail anyone who opposes his aggression."

In Baghdad, the government of Iraq on Tuesday described Bush's speech as an attempt to justify an attack.

Stav Adivi of Ometz-Laserav speaks of fighting in West Bank

By Morris Singer
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Stav Adivi, member of the group Ometz Lesarev (Courage to Refuse), spoke at the University of Massachusetts Student Union Ballroom yesterday about the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

Adivi believes that it is not legal, correct, or humane for members of the Israeli Defense Forces to serve their country in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. These lands constitute occupied territories taken after the Six Day War in 1967.

"We suggest that there are activities that Israel should not be a part of, such as humiliating Palestinians," Adivi said. He believes, as does Ometz Lesarev, that fighting in the West Bank and Gaza is designed simply to "dominate, expel, and humiliate an entire people."

Adivi insists that he was raised on the beliefs of Zionism, and still supports the State of Israel. He affirmed his support that the State of Israel has the right to exist as a Jewish state, but said that the only solution to peace is a two-state solution.

"There is hope that two states, Israel and Palestine, can live one along with the other," he said.

KRISTIN HULL/COLLEGIAN
Stav Adivi passionately addresses the Israeli-Palestinian conflict to a captive audience.

Adivi claims that with a separate, autonomous Palestinian state, the Palestinian people would be less likely to turn to terrorism, and more likely to undertake activities to further their standard of living and economy.

He did note that he feels there is a level of uncertainty as to the result of relinquishing control over the occupied territories, but that it is the only option that Israel can take at this point in time.

"We can never be sure that with ending the occupation, the violence will stop, but if we do not end the occupation, the violence will keep going," Adivi argued.

This point was the main tenet of Adivi's talk, and he stressed on several occasions that the violence is a direct cause of Israel's occupation of the West Bank and Gaza.

"I think that everybody should work to promote the idea that the occupation brings violence," said Adivi, who sees the occupation as something that is ruining Israel and feels that it must stop in order for Israel to achieve peace.

Adivi believes that Israel can only withstand violence for so long, and that an end to occupation would remove stresses on the country that could, in the long run, prove to be potentially fatal to Israel's existence. He said that the path that Israel's government is currently taking is not the correct one.

"[Ariel] Sharon is totally wrong with his ideas... He does not have a plan for the future," Adivi declared.

He added that Israel is not successful in combating suicide attacks and that the only way to stop them is to fix the situation that is causing them.

"Innocent Palestinians are dying while the IDF tries to prevent suicide bombings," Adivi said.

He feels that a strong border with a Palestinian state would be more efficient and effective than fighting a threat from within.

Adivi hopes that one day, Israel "will have a border with the Palestinians like [the United States] has with Canada."

The lecture was sponsored by the UMass Office of ALANA Affairs, the Campus Activities Office, the Asian and Asian American Studies Program, and the Media Education Foundation.

UMass Professor James E. Young to speak on the memory of 9/11

By Anne Lee
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

James E. Young, professor of English and chairman of the department of Judaic and Near Eastern Studies at the University of Massachusetts, will speak on "Memory and the Monument after 9/11," on Thursday, October 10 at 4 p.m. in the Massachusetts Room at the Mullins Center.

Young, a frequent commentator on efforts to memorialize Ground Zero in New York City, will examine how memory and monuments interrelate in his talk. Young says every era creates monuments, "things that remind, things to be transmitted to later generations."

In the wake of last year's terrorist attacks, Young will discuss how memories and monuments coincide. Young will also discuss the continuous demand for monumentality and the role it is taking "in an era when the monument itself seems inadequate to the demands of public commemoration of disastrous events."

Young is the author of At Memory's Edge: After-Images of the Holocaust in Contemporary Art and Architecture, and is a leading authority on Holocaust memorialization. His previous book, The Texture of Memory, won the National Jewish Book Award in 1994.

In addition to books, Young recently authored the foreword for the catalog of the controversial exhibit "Mirroring Evil: Nazi Imagery/Recent Art," at the Jewish Museum in New York. In 1988, he curated the museum's "The Art of Memory," an exhibition that later traveled to Germany.

In 1997, he was invited to speak to the Bundestag on Germany's Holocaust memorial issue and was later appointed to the five-member Findungskommission for Germany's national Holocaust memorial. As the only foreigner and few on the panel, Young was active in guiding the memorial through its successful vote in the Bundestag. Because of this, Young became the commission's spokesperson, often appearing in German television and radio. Young has been a member of the University faculty since 1988.

Young's talk is the first in a series of four Distinguished Faculty Lectures. Other lectures in the series will be delivered by the following guests: Maurille Fournier, professor of Biochemistry and Molecular Biology on Tuesday, Nov. 19; Alan C. Swendlund, professor of Anthropology, on Monday, March 3; and Barbara Osborne, professor of veterinary and animal sciences, on Wednesday, April 2.

All faculty members in the series will receive a Chancellor's Medal following their lectures. The Chancellor's Medal is the highest honor bestowed on individuals for exemplary and extraordinary service to the University. The Office of the Chancellor and the Office of the Provost are the sponsors of the lecture series. For more information, call 545-0444.

Blake discusses ancient Aztec game

By Desiras Mix
Correspondent

Dr. Michael Blake, a member of the Archaeological Institute of America, talks about the ancient game "Ballcourt" to an audience in Bartlett Hall. Blake is a member of the Archaeological Institute of America.

Dr. Michael Blake, a speaker with the Archaeological Institute of America (AIA) Lecture Program, spoke yesterday at Bartlett Hall. His speech was focused on the origins of the original ball game set in the ancient Aztec time period of around 1700 B.C.

Dr. Blake, originally from Canada, graduated with a degree in Anthropology from the University of Michigan. He finished the previous night at New York University and was appreciative of speaking on Mesoamerican popular ball sports originated here. Vola-ball was founded in the beginning years of Hebrew and Christianity in Israel, played in synagogues. Do you by any chance see the Universities of Massachusetts?

"Many other key items to learn there at Mass Amherst," said Blake.

Blake said many of the ideologies used in Classical Mesoamerican art included Aztec figures, Quetzalcoatl, Tlaloc, Xipe Totec and the ancient Plumed Serpent and Jaguar.

"I use artistic renderings of pottery, bowls, stones in Basel and other sites and ask them what's going on during the game," Blake said.

Paso de le Amada was a prime spot for an archaeological site and partaking observation. Because it has one of the greatest plots that will host many ball game visitations, they did not find the kinds of damaging previous artifacts and fossils in good preservation form or completely.

Blake noticed these elongated hills that contained the flat plains and began digging. What he discovered were old clay walls that revealed them to be as being homes for the people of the late Tocoma time period (1500 B.C.) through the Barra phase (1000 B.C.). This was verified Monday by Buried underneath Monte 7 Texas at 250 meters away from Monte 6 – not the original "Ballcourt".

Blake said Ballcourt consisted of the first "ball games" from ancient Aztec descent. The objective of the game is to keep the ball moving at all times. The actual court is 78 meters long by 30 meters wide. The basic structure of a court was two long perpendicular hills. Blake said to picture a hot dog bun and the participants in the game would play where the hot dog would go.

Players would need to hit the ball, which was made out of rubber and weighed anywhere from four pounds to nine pounds, up against a hill (the thicker bread part of the bun). Blake said what made it more complicated was players could not use their hands, arms, feet or knees to hit the ball. Players had to use their hips and hit the ball against the hill so it would roll back down and then try to hit it to the opponent's side of the court.

In order to score a point, players would try to stop the ball from moving when it was on their opponent's side. Blake decided Ballcourt was too difficult to explain, so he called on two audience members for a demonstration of the game. After a few moments of hesitance, two people were picked and performed a visual model of the game.

Blake noted that the stakes of the game were unclear, but early depictions of players and rulers illustrate slaying and sacrifices to the gods of the losers of a Ballcourt match.

An audience member asked Blake if Ballcourt was used instead of violent warfare and Blake said that it may have been the way rulers and communities would settle disputes.

According to Blake, there are many variations of the game, depending on the size of the ball, number of players, and size of the court. There are still other ancient Ballcourt courts located around Central America as well. Another court was discovered in Pampa de las Lamas, located in the Cassma Valley in Peru, which dates back to 1600 B.C. It is currently one of the oldest courts discovered, however, Paso de le Amada was the first court Blake discovered.

Blake went on to explain that Ballcourt influenced artifacts of the time, such as clay figurines and paintings. He also said that the game brought about a religious aspect to the community.

According to Blake, Ballcourt was believed to be a "birth of society" and most of these religious followers believed that people were created by the game.

Blake is a representative of AIA, the traveling Lecture Program. He has gone on hundreds of excavations and has done most of his research in Central America.

"Sorry folks, it's not exactly as intriguing as Ancient Rome or Egypt, but this [dirt and hills] is archaeology too," Blake said sarcastically.

Congress

"The speech contained misleading information through which Bush is trying to justify an illogical and illegitimate attack on Iraq," said Foreign Minister Naji Sabri Sabri.

On Tuesday, a Pentagon official reiterated U.S. warnings that Iraqi military officers should refuse orders to use chemical or biological weapons. Any Iraqis involved in such attacks would be treated as war criminals after the conflict ended, said Douglas Feith, undersecretary for policy at the Defense Department.

The House has allotted 21 hours to debate what House International Relations Committee Chairman Henry Hyde, R-Ill., a chief sponsor of the White House backed resolution, called "one of the most consequential questions we will deal with for years to come."

That resolution urges the United Nations to enforce strict new rules on inspecting Iraq and eliminating its weapons of mass destruction, while giving the president the authority to act unilaterally if the United Nations fails to crack down on the Iraqi threat. It also requires the president to notify Congress, no later than 48 hours after commencing military action, on why diplomatic efforts were inadequate.

Bush said congressional authorization of a military strike "does not mean that military action is imminent or unavoidable. The resolution will tell the United Nations, and all nations, that America speaks with one voice and is determined to make the demands of the civilized world mean something."

Both the House and Senate will also vote on more narrowly drawn alternatives, backed mainly by Democrats, that would authorize force only to deal with the Iraqi weapons buildup and allow unilateral action against Iraq only after the United Nations fails to act or Iraq refuses to cooperate with demands for unfettered inspections.

There was little doubt, however, that the Bush-backed language would win out in the end, probably by a sizable margin.

At the United Nations, the United States on Monday continued talks to gain approval for a Security Council resolution accusing Iraq of violating past resolutions, specifying what it must do and threatening force if it were to refuse. Britain supports the United States, but the other three veto-wielding members inspecting Iraq and eliminating its weapons of mass destruction, while giving the president the authority to act unilaterally if the United Nations fails to crack down on the Iraqi threat. It also requires the president to notify Congress, no later than 48 hours after commencing military action, on why diplomatic efforts were inadequate.

Bush said congressional authorization of a military strike "does not mean that military action is imminent or unavoidable. The resolution will tell the United Nations, and all nations, that America speaks with one voice and is determined to make the demands of the civilized world mean something."

Both the House and Senate will also vote on more narrowly drawn alternatives, backed mainly by Democrats, that would authorize force only to deal with the Iraqi weapons buildup and allow unilateral action against Iraq only after the United Nations fails to act or Iraq refuses to cooperate with demands for unfettered inspections.

There was little doubt, however, that the Bush-backed language would win out in the end, probably by a sizable margin.

At the United Nations, the United States on Monday continued talks to gain approval for a Security Council resolution accusing Iraq of violating past resolutions, specifying what it must do and threatening force if it were to refuse. Britain supports the United States, but the other three veto-wielding members inspecting Iraq and eliminating its weapons of mass destruction, while giving the president the authority to act unilaterally if the United Nations fails to crack down on the Iraqi threat. It also requires the president to notify Congress, no later than 48 hours after commencing military action, on why diplomatic efforts were inadequate.

Democrats stressed Monday that the lack of international units on Iraq would make a U.S. attack on Iraq significantly more dangerous and difficult.

Rep. John Spratt, D-S.C., said unilateral action should be avoided if possible. "Instead of being the United Nations versus Iraq ... this war will be the United States versus Iraq and in some quarters, the United States versus Muslims and Arabs," he said.

13-year-old student shot at Maryland school

Authorities believe it to have been sniper attack

By David Crary
Associated Press

Prince George's County police monitor the scene at Benjamin Tasker Middle School after a 13-year-old student was shot and critically wounded as his aunt dropped him off at school early Monday, Oct. 7, 2002, in Bowie, MD.

BOWIE, MD (AP) – Playgrounds and parks were empty, shoppers darted warily across parking lots and shaken parents escorted children to and from school Tuesday, a day after a youngster was wounded by the sniper roaming suburban Washington.

"Usually I'm embarrassed to walk around and hold my mom's hand, but I don't care today," said Amanda Wiedmaier, 13, whose Benjamin Tasker Middle School was the scene of Monday's shooting of a classmate.

Security firms across the region reported a surge in interest. About 50 Starbucks stores removed their outside seats. And mental health counselors scrambled to set up crisis hot lines for people upset by the string of shootings that have left six people dead and two wounded since last week.

"This is a person who is shooting elderly men, shooting women and now shooting little children," Gov. Parris Glendening said. "This is the act of an absolute coward."

The latest victim, a 13-year-old boy, remained in critical but stable condition Tuesday with a wound to the chest. He was shot early Monday after he was dropped off at school.

With few solid clues or witness accounts, a task force of federal, state and local investigators is sifting through more than 7,500 phoned-in tips. Police said they have 1,400 credible leads but refused to disclose details.

Many Tasker parents kept their children home Tuesday; attendance was down by one-third. Other parents served as volunteer guards, watching over intersections.

Dorothy Prather, a Tasker teacher, was impressed by how well students responded to the traumatic events. "They came right in today and sat down and went right on with their work," she said. "The only ones who seemed really concerned were the parents."

Before classes started, Prather said, the principal addressed the students over the intercom, urging them to get back to business but reminding them that counselors were available if needed.

Less than a mile from Tasker, the colorful playground equipment at the Crestfill Baptist Church nursery school went unused. School director Stacie Hall decided to keep her 2- to 6-year-old charges indoors all day, and let the teachers choose their own gentle explanations.

"One little girl told me, 'We can't go outside today because we might get sunburned,'" Hall said.

Her 13-year-old daughter, Krystle, attends Tasker and was a friend of the wounded boy. Hall said she did not want her daughter to attend school Tuesday, but Krystle decided otherwise.

"She insisted," Hall said. "After much prayer and thought, she decided it was really important to go."

The sniper has shot eight people altogether in the past week. One died on a Washington street, the others within five miles of each other in Maryland's Montgomery County. Police believe the sniper is picking victims at random and firing from a distance with a high-powered hunting or military-style rifle. All of the victims were cut down by a single bullet.

Authorities said they were looking at a number of earlier shootings for possible links to the sniper. Among the cases is a Sept. 14 shooting outside a liquor store in Montgomery County that wounded a store employee.

Arnie Zelkovitz, the owner of Hillandale Beer and Wine, said police interviewed him about the shooting. His 22-year-old employee was shot in the back.

Zelkovitz said he believes his employee was a victim of the sniper: "It just seems too coincidental."

Ballistics tests found that the bullet that struck the boy was identical to those that killed some of the others and wounded a woman in Virginia. That woman was released from the hospital Tuesday.

The FBI has set up command posts in Montgomery County and provided helicopter, field office, lab and computer support. The reward posted for helping catch the sniper has increased steadily to $257,000.

At a mall near Tasker, employees at a Coldwell Banker real estate office noticed shoppers were edgy.

"They don't get out of their car without looking around, then they dash in the store," Polly Rogers said.

"You don't see people on their porch, or playing tennis. We're not used to this – we think Bowie is the safest place."

Saunders continued by explaining that he felt last year's Senate was under the influences of the Speaker and his ideas, and not its own.

"Last year there was too much dictatorship from the Speaker to put issues out there, and my agenda is the same as everyone else's," Saunders said. "I'm looking to the Senate for ideas versus my bringing them ideas."

Other changes to be discussed at tonight's meeting are the number of newly elected senators. Energy has been expressed by members of the SGA as the key to their success this year, and President Dave Carr and Saunders both agreed the new senators have the energy to make change.

"We have a lot of new people, and only a few returning and I think where we are right now is good because we have new energy in the Senate," Saunders said. "We're working so closely with the Administration this year and I think it's going to be a good year with new people. Hopefully they'll stay involved and get new people involved as well."

Tonight's meeting will be held in room 174 of the Campus Center at 7 p.m. All Senate meetings are open to the public.

EDITORIAL/OPINION

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM ED/OP EDITOR JAMIE FOO

The Associated Press: Welcome to UMass

The staff of The Massachusetts Daily Collegian is happy to present a new service to our readers.

At The Collegian we are always trying to improve our content and bring broader coverage to our readership. However, being a student-run paper, we are confronted with several obstacles in trying to bring this coverage.

We have overcome one of these obstacles.

In today's paper you may have noticed several Associated Press stories. The Collegian has joined the extensive list of AP member newspapers and will now be offering stories from the wire in our daily publication.

By bringing AP stories to the paper we are hoping to expand the national and international coverage we present. It is very difficult to get accurate accounts of what is going on throughout the world.

Now we can tap the resources provided by the AP.

For those readers unfamiliar with it, the Associated Press is a worldwide organization that employs reporters, photographers and videographers to cover events wherever they unfold.

The AP hires journalists to write solely for the service, run through bureaus located throughout the world. There are also "stringers" who submit stories from more isolated locations and report to the closest bureau. In addition to printing stories from the AP, we will also be using the photo services provided on "the wire."

The use of photos is essential to any newspaper. Graphically, being an AP photo member will allow us to do more than offer a "maroon and white" sports page. This is probably one of the biggest improvements that the AP will bring us.

News coverage will also be aided by the photo services. When newsworthy stories happen around the country or world, we are at a loss. As a student staff with a limited budget, it is difficult to cover these events. The AP will allow us to do this in a timely manner.

We hope that by bringing this new service to you, the reader, we can increase our coverage of stories and issues that are important to all of the campus.

Still, this does not mean that we will lose our local coverage. We will always hold our commitment to covering campus and five-college events and stories.

Also, with the use of the AP wire, we are not trying to limit our number of student writers. We gladly accept student writers and encourage anyone interested to come to our newsroom in the Campus Center basement.

Feedback is always welcome on our content. With the introduction of the AP wire we hope that we will receive some feedback from our readership.

We hope that this addition will help us bring you comprehensive coverage and improve our paper as a whole.

Four years or bust

KATIE LANDERS

Graduation is just a short seven months away. These three years passed quickly, but I think when May comes I'll be ready to move on. What I have noticed is that sometimes four years just isn't enough for some people to graduate. A common trend here at UMass currently is taking five years to graduate. Some say this is the fault of the decreasing classes offered, and others for personal discrepancies. Being the avid David Letterman fan that I am, I've decided to write up the top ten reasons that people don't graduate on time. Yes, I'm unoriginal. Very unoriginal.

Ten. Changing your major. Well, very typical of every college students but for some odd reason a lot of people think they can wait until junior year. Not a smart idea. Once you change your major and perhaps your college, then everything gets screwed up, like these "Global Education requirements" and what not. Oddly enough, UMass has different general education requirements throughout the university, so basically often enough you're screwed. Know what you want to do for the next few years of your life by the time you are 19.

Nine. Transferring. UMass doesn't accept a lot of credits from other schools. If you miss out on freshman year, come sophomore year you are playing catch up with college writing, RIs, and all that fun stuff. Basically, you should have just come here in the first place.

Eight. Working at The Collegian. This has not necessarily affected me but it has been known to afflict other writers. Freshmen, don't be scared to come work here, but remember to go to class. You have until 2 a.m. to get that paper out. Then get up again and go to class. Don't try to study at The Collegian either. Bad idea.

Seven. Not going to class. Luckily, I saved myself from this one after sophomore year. You notice though, that people develop the habit of skipping classes like gen ed's and large lectures because, hey, who's going to notice? Eventually you haven't been to class since you got the syllabus and it's time for the midterm. Cram all you want, but Mad Dathers will only get you so far.

Six. Being a Communication major. What seems like one quarter of UMass is trying to get into 20 classes and get all credits finished, plus getting into foreign language classes, and then maybe trying to get a minor. All that effort. Sometimes it takes three years just to figure out what you have to do. Instead of Communication, be a journalism major. There are smaller classes, more specific subjects, and a lot less credits to finish. Plus, no Global Education Sweet.

Five. Taking a semester off. This is a very rational reason to not graduate on time and I've even contemplated doing it. Miss a semester and it's hard to catch up. But sometimes it is necessary and completely valid.

Four. Getting in the habit of taking 12 credits a semester. I did this for three semesters. Luckily I smartened up and am taking 16 credits during senior year. Blah. Don't get stuck doing that. Wait to have 12 credit semesters until your last year. You'll be able to have more fun than me.

Three. Ever sleep through a 1 p.m. class? Ever wait until 5 a.m. to go to bed and miss your 10:10? Did you register for an 8 o'clock class? Pick late classes, go to bed at a decent hour. You really won't miss anything on a Tuesday night after midnight. I promise that Instant Messenger will still be on your computer when you wake up. Drink coffee and catch up on sleep during the weekend.

Two. Video games. I hate to be sexist but I think this lies mainly on the male constituency. "Max Payne," "Grand Theft Auto III," and "Halo" do not need to be played for 10-hour marathons. Skipping class to play video games is not valid. Pulling an all-nighter to play video games also is not valid. You can take a couple days to beat a game. Be smart like Matt Sacco. Put the Playstation away until the weekend. At least you'll feel less guilty.

One. Going out. One of the best reasons to be here is going out. Uptown is a great place to be, and on any given night you could go out at midnight and see a decent crowd. A good amount of people I know go out every night. Some people do better than others. I'd give anything to go uptown every night but unfortunately my cash is low and I suck at going on less then six hours of sleep. I would risk it if I wasn't such a baby.

That was my take on being at UMass longer than four years. I'm not saying that being here for longer than the generic four years is wrong, because I probably wouldn't mind staying here longer. These were just the reasons I found to be most likely the cause.

Think and speak for yourselves

JIM PIERMARINI

Nobody can argue the fact that we are at a very fragile point in our history. The fighting that our country has become so deeply involved in is on the verge of taking a step to the next level. I'm sure everybody is now aware of the Bush administration's push for another war with Iraq, but most are blinded by the propaganda that it has built to gain support.

Sept. 11 was a tragic day in U.S. history, which brought many people to sympathize our position. Like many, I raised my flag in support of the people that died that day, but brought it back down when I realized where it was all heading. After that day's events, we as a country should have realized the devastation and loss that war brings. Our leaders could have helped us see this. Instead, they made us angry. They made us hate the people that did this to us, and they made us want revenge.

The red, white, and blue flags that once represented the beauty of our country and appreciation of the free lives we live, is now a symbol of pissed off Americans looking to regain what was taken from them. And at first our retaliation was of a "noble" cause. We went after the Taliban forces in Afghanistan in an attempt to weaken and ultimately dismember the organization that struck our country last September. We succeeded. Afghanistan belongs to us, and the process of rebuilding its government to suit ours has begun. Then why are we still so angry? And why has our country let that anger ring?

The only way for our government to gain the support they needed to attack Iraq was to build off of our loss. As I look at my surroundings and my media exposure, all I've seen for the last year was the old faithful red, white, and blue. America this and America that. Eventually these images have become burned into our subconscious. So when Mr. Bush says we need to fight to protect our freedom, just like a puppy trained to "speak" on command, we assume that it's for a righteous cause. The anger and loss we've all been feeling for that last year, was manipulated to the point where we're about accept further violence in the name of "protecting freedom."

Before we all raise our flags to support this action, turn off your TV, stop reading the billboards, and look into the facts. This is war, not a game. We are not a team that needs the support of its fans to gain the motivation to win. This is real life business, and before we go out and replace our "Yankees Suck!" chant, with a "USA!" chant, think about why you support the ideas you do. If it's because of the loss we felt on Sept. 11, check yourself. Iraq is a whole different ball game. If its because you're one of those people that fall into the trends that our TV provides for us, open up your eyes and make a decision of your own. If it's because Saddam has been an enemy of ours for years, than read your history books, and do some logical thinking. If it was all about the weapons that they possess, than we'd be under attack ourselves for the amount of destruction we're capable of causing, and have caused in the past. Martin Luther King, Jr. once said, "The greatest purveyor of violence on the planet is the U.S. government."

I'm not here to tell you our country's true motivation for entering this war (oil), but rather I'm reaching out to the people and asking everyone to take the time and find the facts. Please don't rely on your televisions and newspapers as your sole media for information. All you'll see is what they want you to see and nothing more.

Part of our rights, as Americans, is to intervene with government action. I love this country for how it allows us to live, and I am truly grateful for that, but in no way or form will I support a war where thousands and thousands of people will die so our leaders will stay rich. The facts are out there, people. So when it comes time to make a decision, make sure that your ideas come from your own head, and not from the countless manipulating forces that surround us.

The struggle of being different: Minorities' gift from God

MCKENDRY

Do any of us truly want to be different from everyone else? Think about it. In sports, we all want to be part of the team: in theatre, we all want to be part of the cast. Even in school, since we were little kids, there was that desire to sit at the table with the cool kids and be one of the chosen few.

Now, of course, we are all different, and I think that as college students, the vast majority of us have realized that our differences are what make each of us unique, that there is nobody who fits the definition of "normal." That being said, there are still those who are in the majority, and then all sorts of numerous minorities. Each of us fall into both groups. I'm a white male, middle class, and college-educated (soon to be complete). I'm also a minority. I have blue eyes, wear glasses, and have traveled to Hawaii twice on vacation by the age of 22 (for this I count myself in the fortunate few).

I'm also part of another minority that exists in this world. I'm part of a minority group that is outnumbered nine to one by the majority. I'm part of a minority that is despised so much by some that they don't feel I should even have a right to live. I'm gay.

Much has been made recently about the many cutbacks that our campus has had to endure recently, and trust me there's been many all over the place: teachers have taken early retirements, athletic programs have been dismantled, and support programs of all kinds have been slashed. Lately though, it's been these minority support programs, designed to help minorities (a.k.a. ALANA students), and foster diversity on this campus, that have come under fire. This is a heated issue on both sides that runs deep and in no way do I intend to settle everything in this column. However, I am going to share some of my own thoughts on the issue and let you digest.

Being a minority isn't easy, never has been, and never will be. Whether it's being the only black person at your job, or being left-handed in class with only those damn "right-only" desks, being a minority is a challenge. However, it is something that can't be changed, and just must be dealt with. There's two main ways to deal with the challenge. People can either let their minority define them and be what their entire life is based on, or they can simply let it be another part of what makes them who they are. I usually try to subscribe to the latter.

I could spend the majority of my time hanging around only with other gay people, making that my entire social circle, and therefore shutting out 90% of the world. Yet I don't. The majority of my friends are straight, and that's fine. I don't want to keep being known as "the gay guy." I want to be known simply as Regan.

The support programs are a great benefit to those that are supported by them, but why do they deserve anything special? What entitles a student from an ethnic minority to a special advisor, one that other students don't have access to? I don't have one, but I think I could make a case that being of the minority I am, that I could definitely deserve one.

How many of you are part of a minority that is so hated, that many people are disowned by their own families? Even those who are Latino, often have Latino parents. Asian children. Asian parents, etc. I don't have my family to turn to for support. Even if I was out to them, they don't understand what I'm going through, because I'm different from the rest of them. I'm grateful that my mother wouldn't do this, but I have a friend at work who told me that if he happened to be gay, and if he told his father, that his dad would "beat the s___ out of [him] and then kick [him] out of the house."

How many of you are part of a minority that even most decent people don't want to hear about? Even among a number of my own friends I have to censor what I say. Any of my straight male friends can say whatever they want about a good-looking woman that they see, and believe me they do. Yet if I try to say something about an attractive guy I see, they don't want to hear anything about it. At the sporting events I broadcast, my friends can compliment the cheerleaders, but I know better than to even say something nice about the looks of one of the athletes (but it is acceptable to compliment on the looks of female athletes). The reason this is so: my "lifestyle" is seen but most of them as gross and disgusting.

That's another thing. This isn't a lifestyle; there is no choice involved here. I'm not sure if it's genetic or what, but during that stage in puberty when the hormones begin to kick in, mine just responded differently than most other guys. Now conservatives love to say that I still choose to live a gay "lifestyle." I'll have to admit that's true. My options are to either live a lie and suppress my personality, or be who I truly am. I'd rather not live my entire life repressed, so yes, in that case, I choose to live the gay "lifestyle."

This comes with its share of risks. When Matthew Shepard was killed a few years ago, I'm sure the majority of people felt awful, but at least could think "at least I don't have to worry about that," just to let you know, I do have to worry about that. I don't feel a serious threat and I don't let it alter my life, but it still stays in the back of my mind.

A year ago, after a night out at a club, a majority of us made our way to Dunkin' Donuts in Northampton. When we began to arrive, there two straight kids threatened the group of us. One kid went to his car at the other end of the parking lot and produced a baseball bat to show the two punks. He made it clear that they should knock off their insults and not do anything stupid. He then put the bat away and we continued to go about our business of coffee and bagels. The kids, though, called the police who showed up and told us that we should stop threatening and harassing these two innocent kids. Though I wasn't personally involved in the exchange, it shocked me that I could be betrayed by those whom are assigned to protect me.

I can completely sympathize with the rest of the minorities out there in looking for a safe haven. Part of the joy I experience when I go out to a gay club is the peace of just being in a place where I belong and am surrounded by others like me. Minority groups are great. The advantages that are brought on for being different are not.

I don't want an advantage for being gay. Sure it'd be great to mark it down on an application to try to fill a quota, but I don't want that. In fact even as high up as the military, I can't be asked about my sexual status because the issue is still such a touchy subject. I'd love to have my own special academic advisors, but that wouldn't be fair.

It can be argued that the world is already stacked against minorities, so why not try to even the playing field? The problem with this is that the world will never, ever be level. Once people start trying to balance one side of the equation, it becomes top heavy and the other side tries to shift things back to the middle. This is a never-ending struggle that is best left alone.

Let me be clear, I'm not saying that it is okay to sit and be content with where your place in life is. I applaud everyone who struggles to overcome any of the challenges put in front of them. Life is full of challenges and they are each our own obstacles to deal with. I think about all that I could potentially have to deal with: I don't have a physical or mental disability, I have a home and a job, I don't have a life-threatening illness. In the grand scheme of things, if being gay is the biggest obstacle I have to face in my life, I'm doing pretty well.

Shane Landrum best summed it up in an interview for www.gay.com: "It's a gift from God that I have been marked different than most of the world. Being gay and dealing with it has taught me so much humility and beauty that I get defensive when someone tries to tarnish it for me. Any minority, be it gay or racial, has much more strength of character than most 'Europeaning' Americans,' who have way too many givens in the world."

Why ruin that special gift by looking for special treatment? Part of that gift is destroyed by trying to replace the givens. Go out there and live that wonderful life laid out in front of you. Just do it with the hand you're dealt. It's better that way.

Don't Speek: Speech's new album a breathtaker

By Dan Paladino
COLLEGIAN STAFF

SPEECH
Spiritual People
Vagabond

In the style of his former band, Arrested Development, Speech successfully blends soulful hip-hop with jazz, gospel, and pop in creating the vibrant and uplifting Spiritual People.

On his third solo album, Speech remains true to his musical roots, but doesn't hesitate to create his own unique sound and vibe. As a rapper and singer, Speech remains self-assured and effective in his laidback style.

The songs on Spiritual People are upbeat, intelligently written, and best of all, have pop sensibility without sounding cheap or like anything else on the radio.

What distinguishes Spiritual People from much of mainstream hip-hop is its shear honesty and positive tone. With modern rappers making millions off songs about cars and money, it's refreshing to see a return to a brand of hip-hop that thrives on authentic emotion. And better yet, Spiritual People's upbeat positive nature is never compromised by thoughtless lyrics or a lack of musical depth.

The album kicks off with "Brought to You by tMusic & Life)," an energetic song expressing Speech's insistence on music inspired by life, not money and profit. Speech cleverly begins the track by preaching sermon-style that "Music used to be a timeless expression of one's soul... the thing that reflected the better part of society." With turntables churning and drums and xylophones creating a tight beat, Speech sings about the pitfalls of letting profit guide musical creation. He sings, "We're livin' in a commercial break now/ It ain't about music and life."

As the album flows from track to track, the diversity of the music becomes one of the most impressive features of Spiritual People.

In the title song, "Spiritual People," Speech and his band find themselves wrapped up in a jazzy undercurrent, one reminiscent of A Tribe Called Quest. One of the best songs on the album, this track displays Speech in top form, intermittently rapping and singing with confidence and gusto. Speech sings about his effort to remain spiritually rooted, even in the midst of this fast-paced consumer society.

Like most of the songs on Spiritual People, "The Simple Love of Life," is a distinct musical piece of the album. Deeply rooted in the gospel sound, Speech and his backup vocalists sing triumphantly as if Speech is leading a Sunday-morning choir in front of dancing church-goers.

This song depicts one of the prevailing themes of the album: appreciating the little things in life despite the materialism and negativity of society.

As it did in Arrested Development tunes like "Tennessee," Speech's love of his small-town life shines throughout Spiritual People. "Cruisin' in my Super Beetle" is a feel-good pop tune that adds even more musical flavor to the album. Speech jubilantly sings about wanting to "take a moment to breathe the fresh air." In "Livin' in the Real World," Speech sings, "I'm made for the small town/Family of about four or five." The singer appears content and comfortable with his new family and quiet lifestyle. This feeling permeates every song, adding to the laidback mood of the music.

Some of the tracks in Spiritual People are more low-key and easy going, such as "A Traveler," in which Speech sings about his love of the small-town simple life. Speech's themes are not one-dimensional, however.

In "Burning Rage Inside," a soulful Marvin Gaye-inspired Speech expresses his hidden anger at the thought of infidelity and the struggle to have faith in others to remain loyal.

The album mixes these softer tunes with head-nodding jams effectively, keeping a continuity going that always seems to echo a theme of optimism. Despite Speech's often critical lyrics about the music world and society, his message somehow remains hopeful.

Spiritual People is ultimately charming because of Speech's humility and honest lyrics dealing with marriage ("Always in Love"), spiritual guidance, and the simple life. This lack of pretension is missing in much of today's hip-hop. Moreover, Spiritual People's pop tunes also put the N-Sync's of the pop world to even more shame!

When an album holds together this well while tying in so many different genres of music, it's a real sign that the artists put in considerable effort in producing a unique and enjoyable piece of music. Spiritual People's success is its musical versatility and engaging lyrics.

Its uplifting nature is testament to Speech's maturity and optimism as a songwriter.

Most importantly, it does something Speech realizes many artists have forgotten to do: imitate authentic emotion and life.

Radio 4 up the dial in Boston

The brilliant quintet Radio 4 are making combat rock for the 22nd century. Playing at The Middle East in Cambridge, the crowd that walked in not knowing them left as more than just fans.

By Timothy Gabriele

RADIO 4
Sept. 28

CAMBRIDGE — When it comes to moving a crowd, the modern audience will place its faith squarely on a DJ whose range will fall either within the hip-hop or electronic realm. In the rock world, all dancing of the past 15 years or so has been of the mumbling variety. Despite this trend (and perhaps to spite it), a growing contingent of indie rockers are finally ready to give the drummer some. Perhaps the best of this new breed is Brooklyn's brilliant quintet Radio 4, who ripped through The Middle East on Sept. 28.

Taking their name from a Public Image Limited song, Radio 4 splashed onto the Brooklyn scene with 1999's The New Song and Dance, which took heavy (emphasis on heavy) notes from The Clash's back catalogue to create a frenzy of sound that at least strived to be revolutionary.

When the band returned two years later with their next full-length release Gotham, Radio 4 were making combat rock for the 22nd century. The major unit of change that separated Gotham from The New Song and Dance was the assistance of production team James Murphy and Tim Goldsworthy, whose addition of synthesizers and dance elements to the mix took Radio 4 out of the garage and into the forefront of innovative new music. They soon found themselves associated with a burgeoning Brooklyn scene defined by bands who pledged allegiances to experimental (and often danceable) post-punk influences like PIL, Gang of Four, ESG, Wire, and Suicide to create what Gotham's closing track eloquently proclaimed a "New Disco." The best of these bands, The Yeah Yeah Yeahs, The Liars, Ex-Models, The Rapture, etc., have all been respectively granted the "next big thing" tag by a diverse group of publications for their fusion of garage and electronic music. The Rapture's "House of Jealous Lovers" even made it onto a DJ Kicks album by the techno duo Playgroup.

Supporting veteran Indie stalwarts Girls Against Boys, Radio 4 was preceded by the adequate emo group Garrison, who opened the show at 10 p.m. Unfortunately, they were their Get-Up Kids influences higher on their sleeve than their apparent Hum inspiration. Between songs, the guitarist occasionally made cryptic homoerotic banter that left both the audience and fellow bandmates baffled. During the set break, the crowd filled the vacant space at the dings Middle East in anxiety for Radio 4. It was apparent that many of the kids, coming to show their support for Girls Against Boys or Garrison, had never heard of the five-piece outfit. It was equally apparent by the end of the set that many of them were walking away not just fans, but converts to a brand new sound.

Within seconds of taking the stage, guitarist/occasional vocalist Tommy Williams screeched out some effects-laden staccato notes that dropped like a bomb effectively blowing Garrison right the hell off the stage. Bassist/main vocalist Anthony Roman proceeded to spew forth dub-inspired grooves that rivaled Jah Wobble's. All the while, Roman dispelled chants of wisdom into a distorted microphonic like Julian Casablanca if he were recast as a punk rock Thomas Harris and didn't look so goddamned bored all the time.

Luckily, the band stuck almost exclusively to material off of 2001's Gotham, evoking not only a tactful sense of the energy of New York's own nightlife (as the title of their album suggests), but a universal energy radiating amongst young people united by music all over the world. The percussion section pounded out tightly woven rhythms that have been unfortunately confined to samplers and drum machines for the latter part of the 20th century. Though the dance oriented beats remained constant throughout the night, the number of bodies bobbing to and fro grew gradually as the set progressed until those who had bought in to the new disco were addicted. Converts, indeed.

If I'm correct in assuming that they were converts, the blame can be placed squarely on Roman, whose battle cries to "save your city tonight," and "get behind the struggle right now," are the most direct musical calls to action since Alec Empire's anarchist shout-outs to "destroy 2000 years of culture." Unlike Empire's perverse nihilism, Roman's list of crowd instructions were strictly positive, evoking the "just get on your feet" feel of a funk show. It soon became obvious why the phrase "9/11" continues to appear in the band's reviews and biographies, despite the fact that Gotham was written and released months before the World Trade Center tragedy shook their beloved city to the core. There's something uniquely New York about what Radio 4 bring both to

The Black and White Stripes' our rockin' columnist didn't fall in love with The White Stripes, a band who was labeled "the saviors of rock 'n roll" in Spin magazine.

The so-called superheroes of rock 'n roll?

ROCK 'N' OUT with Samara Marblestone

I really don't get it.

As I was reading the latest issue of Spin, I noticed this big spread on how wonderful and God-like The White Stripes are. Boring, depressing photographs of Jack and Meg White poisoned the pages inside. Don't get me wrong – I have nothing against Jack and Meg, but I do have a little problem with Spin's decision of dubbing them the "saviors of rock 'n roll."

Wow. They did not just refer to The White Stripes as the blessed musicians who saved the commoners of society from the deadly wraths of the supposed "bad" music that existed before Jack and Meg decided to grace their presence on MTV.

Surprisingly, and unfortunately, they did.

Described as a "punkish underground band," Detroit natives Jack and Meg formed The White Stripes in 1997. Even though they publicly claim to be brother and sister, Jack and Meg are an ex-couple who finalized their divorce in 2000. The Stripes first received recognition for being a rock band made up of only two people (Jack performing lead vocals, guitar, and piano; Meg playing the drums and sings background vocals) without using a bass, and for "dressing like candy" (only seen in public wearing matching bright, solid shades of red, white, and black). On January 29, 2002, V2 Records released The Stripes' hit album, White Blood Cells, which features their first hit single, "Fell in Love with a Girl."

Now, let's tune in our ears and face the facts. The White Stripes aren't a revolutionary band in regard to the world of rock 'n roll. Jack's whiny, screeching voice (very similar to that of The Vines' Craig Nicholls) is awkwardly meshed with his hard, rough guitar riffs. If anyone has ever seen Jack perform, he looks like his arms are going to fly off into the audience as he tries his best to maintain the role as the lead singer and lead guitarist at the very same time. Meg just kind of hangs out in the background as she taps out her simple '60's-like drum beats. Occasionally she'll help her ex-husband as a back-up vocalist, but usually she just looks like she's going to either vomit or cry on stage.

The White Stripes first performed live on MTV at the recent MTV Movie Awards and won the award for "Breakthrough Video" at the recent MTV Video Music Awards for their aforementioned hit single. And why the hell was their video "breakthrough?" Was it because the masterminds of music video technology finally cracked the code to replacing musicians with animated red, white, and black Legos? Hey, it won over the hearts of those behind the scenes at MTV. Did it win over mine? It actually just made me feel a little nauseous and embarrassed for Jack and Meg – that's all.

Let me respond to Spin's grand and unnecessary assumption that assigns The White Stripes as the "saviors of rock n' roll."

Ok, how about this: they're not. If anything, they kneed rock n' roll in the balls and kicked it back down to the ground. Absolutely nothing is original about this '60's rock-revival band. Why didn't we just bring back The Beatles or The Ramones? They would have saved rock n' roll, because they actually helped mold and establish it. I truly beg Spin not to pass the crown over to The White Stripes. Their music may be decent, but it definitely doesn't deserve such a prestigious title. Their expressions in their photos didn't show any appreciation for their new, undeserved title. Jack even stares in the Spin article that he has no idea why his hand made the front cover.

"We have to go back," Jack says in the article, explaining his obvious sounding similarities to '60's rock. Here's a little something for 'ya, Jack and Meg – why go back? If we had that attitude towards everything, the word "progress" would be nothing more than a myth. Be creative and create your own music. That's what rock is all about. It's revolutionary, not repetitious.

One can throw a bit of mud at the booming, minor genre IDM (Intelligent Dance Music) has been called progressive, sterile, robotic, mathematic and soulless.

Well, based on a few accusations, perhaps.

The genre of electronica music is riddled with "artists" who are more concerned with program[illegible] and knob twiddling than creating a concept and moving people to groove. These Mac jockeys are often inspiration from groups like Soft Cell and their electronic synth-centric music of Gary Numan, who experimented with the early [illegible] opposed to rock and roll's common musical vocabulary. Now, the lure of love and [illegible]

Despite significant Dance Music participants, they are not necessarily composers. The idea of one person kissing scares many people when they see an I-Ding or a turntable in expensive Parisian apartments set above European delicatessens or in cramped New England dorm rooms being used as a DJing at a frat party. Not to say that any of these places are bad, but [illegible] a program that [illegible] at least get [illegible] to dance to create an emotional reaction to their music. Hmm, looks like some find that [illegible] before not.

The best cultural lifespan of [illegible] programmers is running [illegible] Capitol K. Capitol K did not [illegible] him.

Kristian Craig Robinson is Capitol K, and he's a man of the world. Robinson was born in Malta and raised in Arabia, Russia and England. He currently resides in London where he participates in the rich electronica [illegible]

Found Rose is Capitol K's [illegible] effort following his [illegible] debut Sounds of the Empire. Both albums hold the bouncing bass, skittering beats, and flourishes of samples we have come to expect from IDM, but Found Rose introduces Robinson's skillful guitar playing and an Arabian flavor drawn from his past experiences. The result is one of the most engaging albums of the year.

By coupling the organic sounds of his guitar riffs and fragile, almost childlike, space with the gleaming artificiality of synthesizers and untiring drum machines Robinson has forged a catchy and endearing rock-electronica hybrid. The album is rich in layers of undulating soundscapes and studio trickery. This is headphone music that you can dance to.

On "Capitol Beat Sticky" cut-up and manipulated vocals hiccup over foreboding bass and a sacharine undercurrent of guitar riffs. On "Darussalam" samples of women crooning float amidst horses of frogs, children, and birds that are in turn oozing over brick drumbeats. "Pillow" is an innocent and sentimental nursery rhyme of a song where Robinson apprehensively croons, "The sun will set tonight/ Tomorrow, I'll see you/ I'll give you a ring in the morning/ to find out how you do." "Heat" is a mash of manipulated reverb and echo effects filled out by tinkling bells and chiming clocks. As the end of the album nears the songs subtly shift from innocent to sinister. This is especially true of "Monster" and "Duffle Coat," the album closers which envelop you in soothing synthetic rhythms only to suddenly lull away into pensive drones or explode into clavon surges of noise.

Capitol K is an artist in a genre infested with wannabes and champions of the redundant. By fusing the organic with the synthetic, Capitol K has created an album that is lavishly produced without being a mere bag of tricks – there is humanity and emotion here. Kristian Craig Robinson should be proud of himself.

Ivy, a New York-based trio that consists of vocalist Dominique Durand and musicians Adam Schlesinger and Andy Chase, has been steadily growing a fan base since the band's inception in 1994. They released several EPs and singles before finally putting out their 1995 debut Realistic. The critically acclaimed Apartment Life followed in 1997, and then came Long Distance in 2001. Over the course of their career, they have gained numerous fans and have become visible enough to land a guest appearance on the TV series "Roswell" and a slot working with the Farrelly Brothers on their last two movies (they scored Shallow Hal.) Ivy now returns with Guestroom, a brand new CD consisting of 10 cover songs, five of the them newly recorded and the other five existing in hard to find forms as singles and B-sides.

The New York-based trio Ivy return with the inviting Guestroom, a brand new CD consisting of 10 cover songs, five existing in hard to find forms as singles and B-sides.

Ivy's sound is of dreamy, mellow chilled-pop music played with style and sophistication. Durand, a native Parisian, has an ethereal, angelic voice that floats over the laid back beats supplied by Chase and Schlesinger. Long Distance was a lush, fragile, silky little album that crawled into the conscience and made itself a comfortable home there. Guestroom is similar in that it grabs hold with as little force as possible, relaxing itself into the head of the listener.

Ivy kick off with a revamp of the Cure's "Let's Go to Bed," a synth-pop number that, thanks to Durand, turns into a dream that both whispers and thumps. Among the other more famous songs that Ivy covers are Steely Dan's "Only a Fool A Would Say That" and "Be My Baby" by the Ronettes, and Durand gets to make use of her native tongue on Serge Gainsbourg's "L'Anamour." Among the highlights on the album are the Caribbean lounge of "Only a Fool...," the lovely "Streets of Your Town," and the summery acoustic bop of "I Don't Know Why I Love You."

Actually the entire span of Guestroom is a highlight. It's a gorgeous, crystalline album that dances and twirls itself into the psyche. Find it at the store and buy it – that's all else I can say.

Casual Sketch offer hilarious spoofs

By Reid Davenport
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

On Friday, Oct. 4, Casual Sketch opened up the year with a hilarious sketch show. The cast of crazy college co-eds hit the audience with jokes on everything ranging from Dick Cheney to Scottish newscasters. Along with them was the new musical group, straight out of Scotland, The Floating Widgets.

This group doesn't tread on "Saturday Night Live" water. If they attempted their material on TV, the FCC would probably have them sent to jail. Nevertheless, Casual Sketch is by no means meant to be "family entertainment," it is aimed toward college students.

The Casual Sketch actors will show anyone why they are possibly the best sketch group on the UMass campus. While the returning cast did an excellent job at causing at least five audience members to wet their pants, the two new members of Casual Sketch held their own on the stage. The returning cast includes director Sarah Koske, producer Katie Mayer, Sean Kelley, Mike Carr, Ryan Murphey, Misty (Dan) Bloom, Tom Skowron, Adam Hyman, Adam Desjardins, Andy Hobgood, and Drex Drexler. The two new members are Chris Manz and Josh Michel.

CASUAL SKETCH

"The Casual Sketch actors will show anyone why they are possibly the best sketch group on the UMass campus."

The night opened up with an "Inner Monologue" featuring Adam D., Adam H., Misty, and Sarah. Needless to say, the opening set the stage for the show. Soon to follow were a Sylvester Stallone bit, a few appearances from Dick Cheney (played by Misty), and a dwarf that is used to make a person so sick, he or she will be puking his way home.

Between sketches, the Floating Widgets performed Celtic-sounding tunes to entertain the crowd. The Floating Widgets added their own humor as they sang. The Casual Sketch member Adam H. also broke out into the song sung by Sir Robin's mistrals in Monty Python and the Holy Grail.

The night ended with a sketch taking aim at the Massachusetts governor's race, with Ted Kennedy promoting a monkey, named Mr. Scribbles, as the Democratic candidate for governor. Then we were treated with Adam D. and Sean scrubbing each other down with soap, while wearing only underwear. Was it disturbing or funny? You make the call.

If you missed the show, or have yet to see Casual Sketch, shows are also scheduled on Nov. 1 and Dec. 6.

the stage and to their recordings. That unstated something recalls such energetic and revolutionary N.Y. artists as The Velvet Underground, The Ramones, and Patti Smith. If the music itself is not revolutionary (and I'm not saying that it isn't), it at least feels like it wants very badly to be thought of as such. In a music scene saturated with dying rapcore dinosaurs, stale pop tarts, and a garage crop that are beginning to look a lot like rock stars, it's refreshing to see a band give their everything to a crowd in hopes that it will give something back.

There was very little direct communication to the audience, however. Roman and Williams kept their comments to a minimum and let the continuous infectious rhythms speak for themselves. The set was fairly brief at about an hour or so, with no time allotted for an encore. The band did however bring out several friends from Girls Against Boys to help in the closer "Dance to the Underground" off an EP released between the two full-length albums.

"This song's about enthusiasm," Roman said briefly before tearing into "Calling All Enthusiasts." Call, they did. Enthusiastic, we were. And so we danced to the sounds of the revolution.

Florida teams shine in NFL's Week Five

Week Five saw quarterback changes and solid matchups. Patrick Ramsey and Tommy Maddox made a case for keeping their teams' respective starting jobs while Miami faced New England and San Diego took on Denver in two of a handful of premier games.

Is that a monkey off your back or are you just happy to see me?

St. Louis had beaten San Francisco in six straight games heading into this weekend, but the Niners dismantled the Rams 37-13. Too bad the entire Bay Area was watching the American League Championship Series on the Discovery Channel or TLC or one of those cable networks that no one watches, unless "The Wonder Years" is on.

The win was big for the Niners' confidence, but this Rams team, now 0-5, is a shell of its former self. Especially with All-World QB Kurt Warner injured.

The Fred Taylor injury countdown

It's official, off-injured Jacksonville tailback Fred Taylor is going to head back to the sidelines soon. After all, every NFL pregame show is featuring him, talking about how good he is when healthy and making the tags its playoff sleepers. The Florida alum did struggle in this week's win against the Eagles, who feature a tough run defense, but Taylor is the most important piece of the Jacksonville offense. So, obviously, he is a sure bet to limp off the field in the next two or three weeks.

Congratulations, see you again this time next year

TJO – Tampa receiver Keyshawn Johnson caught his first touchdown of the year this week in a 20-6 win over Atlanta. Despite catching 106 passes (tops in the NFC) last year, Johnson hauled in just one touchdown over the 16-game season. Guess we have to wait 12 months before seeing No. 19 reach paydirt again.

Same game, worse news

In Atlanta's 20-6 loss to Tampa Bay, quarterback Michael Vick, a.k.a. the most exciting player in football, was knocked out of the game by the Buccaneer defense. Vick must stay in the pocket more to last an entire season. No one wants to see the best athlete in football on the sidelines during the peak of his career (think Randall Cunningham). Stay in the pocket, Mike. I can't handle the thought of watching Falcons games without you on the field.

If this was college football...

Here is my Top Five:

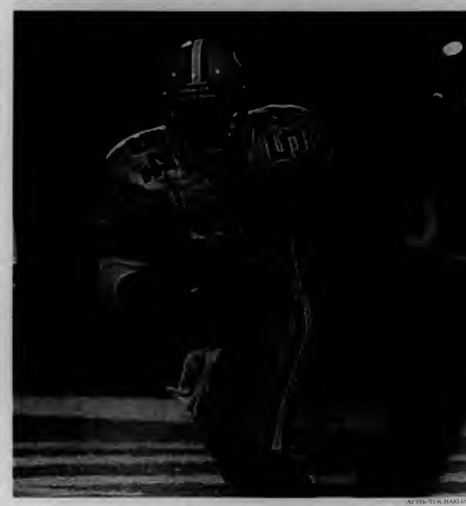
Oakland Raiders (4-0) – Could someone please beat these guys so I can drop them in rank? I'm not sure I can handle putting them at the top of the list again. This team just reeks of "we'll get off to a great start, but fade out in Week 11." At least, that's what I keep telling myself.

Miami Dolphins (4-1) – Huge win over the defending Super Bowl Champion New England Patriots this week. Running back Ricky Williams has been great for Miami, and ranks second in the AFC in rushing this year. The continued improvement of second-year receiver Chris Chambers helps as well. But can the Fins follow it up with a win at Denver next week?

Denver Broncos (4-1) – They beat up on then-undefeated San Diego, and QB Brian Griese and RB Clinton Portis seem to be improving with each game. Next week's matchup with Miami will prove exactly how much.

Tampa Bay Buccaneers (4-1) – Their defense is giving up just over 10 points per game. If they can keep it up and get Keyshawn the damn ball, this team has a shot at No. 1. Still have a problem with Brad Johnson quarterbacking any team I'm behind, however.

Green Bay Packers (4-1) – There are a few teams that could go here, but that deadly combination of QB Brett Favre and RB Ahman Green put the Pack in the top five. The defense is looking better and Favre has worked out the timing with his new receiving corps. Next week's game against New England should help the football world figure out Green Bay.



How about my darn fantasy team

In one of the all-time great fantasy matchups, my Lonesome Sundays fell to Vanilla Frappe this weekend, 237-230. The two teams ranked 1-2 in the league this week and it was unfortunate that one of us had to lose, especially since it was Sundays. So, despite having the top point total in my division, I am just 2-3 on the season.

Not cool.

The 0-fer watch

Good news, kiddies. There are three teams with zero wins through the first five weeks of the season. The Rams (0-5) are looking more promising with the injury to Kurt Warner. Now, if RB Marshall Faulk went down, I would feel much, much better. Though there is no way they could beat undefeated Oakland, right? Right? I don't even know who to root for in this one.

AP/WIDE WORLD PHOTOS

Ranked in Jim's Top Five, the Green Bay Packers got a major contribution this week from linebacker Nate Wayne when he intercepted Bears' quarterback Jim Miller's pass in the fourth quarter of the 34-21 Packer victory.

The Minnesota Vikings (0-4) had this week off. Sadly, there didn't seem to be any more incredibly dumb off-the-field problems this week by Vikings players. How is that possible? There are rumors that the Vikes may suspend Moss because of the whole "using a traffic officer for a hood ornament" thing. If that happens, I will really like our chances. Sadly, I have a really bad feeling about this week's contest against the Lions. We'll have to keep our fingers crossed.

It is still the Bungals that I have the most faith in for perfect mediocrity. Indianapolis almost gave away this week's game, which would have been devastating, but Cincy managed to fall, 28-21. Jon Kitna's solid day (244 yards) has me worried, as does next week's contest against Pittsburgh.

Torre, Cashman reflect on four bad days

By Hal Bock
The Associated Press

NEW YORK (AP) – The way general manager Brian Cashman and manager Joe Torre see it, the New York Yankees' quick elimination from the playoffs was just a case of four bad days in October, the wrong time for that to happen.

"This is a good team, a very good team," Cashman said Monday. "It just didn't play well for four days. You can't afford that. The biggest issue is not how to remake it. It's how you deal with the openings that might be there.

"I'm proud of this team. The best record in baseball is not easy to do. You can't judge a 103-win team on four games. It was a championship caliber team. Poor play at the wrong moment cut us down."

The play was poor. The pitching was worse. Anaheim set a postseason record with a .376 batting average against the Yankees' staff. That may be where the openings develop.

Roger Clemens, 40 years old and seven wins away from 300 is eligible for free agency. Relievers Mike Stanton and Ramiro Mendoza also are free agents. Andy Pettitte has an $11.5 million club option for next year. Arbitration-eligible Orlando Hernandez has no contract. Each of them except for Stanton had long stretches on the disabled list in the last two years.

Hernandez was asked about next season.

"I don't think of the future," he said. "I think of now and packing to go home. If you looked far ahead (before the playoffs), we thought we'd be champions. That means you should take things day to day."

Torre knows the fault was with his pitchers, who were lit up by the Angels hitters. He also knows he would have used the same ones – Clemens, Pettitte, Mike Mussina and David Wells – if he had it to do over again.

"If we played all over again, I'd do the same things," he said. "I didn't second-guess myself. I made the decisions that didn't work out. I get paid a lot of money to sit here and make decisions and win the World Series. You're supposed to do that.

"We got into the World Series four years in a row. It seems like it's an automatic. It's not cut and dried. There's a lot of work involved."

The Yankees weren't the only surprise casualties of the best-of-five first-round playoff series.

"You look up out of the foxhole and see the Diamondbacks out," he said. "You see Oakland (another 103-win team) losing to a team that was not supposed to be here or even be in baseball this year. And you see Atlanta with a lead on a wild-card team, having to go to a fifth game.

"Things happen. It's strange. It should have told me something when we had a tied All-Star game that this would be a strange year."

The Yankees had come to view the American League pennant as their manifest destiny after winning four in a row and capturing three World Series. They learned it was not that simple, especially when their pitchers had an 8.21 earned run average, the worst in the team's storied postseason history.

Torre preferred to view it as an aberration.

"We sent four starters to the mound and they didn't pitch as well as they're capable," he said. "They'd be the first to tell you that. You like to believe it will be there for you when you need it and it has been."

The failure left Torre with an intriguing dilemma in the pennant playoff between Anaheim and Minnesota.

"Do you want the team that beat you to go to the World Series?" he said. "Or do you want the team you beat all six times (you played) to go to the World Series? You look good either way."

NBA camps begin

This past week marked the beginning of training camps around the NBA. The season kicks off Oct. 29 and it will be here before you know it, so let's get down to all the happenings from the first week of camps around the league.

The New York Knicks have started off from where they ended last year – in turmoil. Latrell Sprewell showed up to training camp with a broken hand that nobody had even known about, including "Spree" himself.

The New York Post reported later in the week that he broke his hand while punching a wall on his yacht. Well, he wasn't aiming for the wall; he was actually aiming for the boyfriend of the girl who threw up on his new white carpet aboard his yacht. At least Spree showed some class for going after the boyfriend and not the girl.

ADAM LEVOY

Sprewell will miss anywhere from six to eight weeks, which means he will miss at least the first two weeks of the season. He did not get his hand X-rayed when the incident first happened about two weeks ago. Players in the NBA have a clause in their contract that they have to report injuries promptly – as soon as they happen. As a result, Knicks General Manager Scott Layden fined Sprewell $250,000 (the largest fine in history that a professional sports team has given one its players) and told him to stay away until he could bring a "positive contribution to the team."

The question is did Sprewell not know he had a broken hand, or did he wait until the beginning of camp to report it? This could very well be his way of getting back at the Knicks for all the trade rumors surrounding him over the summer.

This was not the only problem at the Knicks' camp this week. Starting power forward-center Kurt Thomas was arrested after allegedly hitting his wife. Maybe the Knicks should hold anger management classes so their players do not go around hitting everyone.

Thomas has always had a temper on the court, but this is his first instance of aggression occurring off the basketball court. After arriving at camp, he was called by the police on his cell phone and asked to return to his home right away for questioning and eventually his arrest. He is currently in the middle of an ugly divorce, and has been ordered not to go near his wife. Thomas will not miss any games, but he will hear the hecklers all season, just as Jason Kidd of the New Jersey Nets (who also was arrested for hitting his wife last year) did from opposing fans.

The Utah Jazz signed free agent Mark Jackson to back up future Hall of Famer John Stockton. Now, Karl Malone has not one but two great assist men of this generation feeding him the ball. Jackson is a veteran and will serve as a good backup for Stockton.

Although he is a shell of his former self, Jackson needs to play the "pick and roll" with the Mailman, and the Jazz will be a respectable team once again.

Gary Payton finally decided to show up for the Seattle Supersonics camp. He is in the last year of his contract with the Sonics, and is trying to either get a new contract settled or be traded to a contender before it is too late in his career. He has been unhappy the last couple of seasons in Seattle, because the team has not restructured his contract or surrounded him with more talent – preferably a top notch all-star. He has been the "glue" of the Sonics for years and he is tired of losing.

Scottie Pippen, Reggie Miller, and Allen Iverson all suffered minor injuries but are expected to be back by the season's opener. Elton Brand and Lamar Odom are expected to start the season on the injured list. And yes, Michael Jordan will be back on the Wizards this year, although it may be as a bench player, at least for the beginning of the season.

Buffaloes put on probation

By John Mossman
Associated Press

BOULDER, Colo. (AP) – Colorado's football team was placed on two years' probation by the NCAA on Tuesday for recruiting violations, most of them occurring under former coach Rick Neuheisel.

The NCAA cut the school's football scholarships and accepted Colorado's self-imposed recruiting limits, including reducing the number of visits by recruits.

Neuheisel, now coaching at Washington, was barred from off-campus recruiting for the Huskies until May 31.

Colorado was not banned from TV or bowl appearances but must reduce the number of new scholarships it offers from 25 to 20 in either the 2003-04 or 2004-05 academic year.

NCAA institutions are allowed 56 expense-paid campus visits by recruits each academic year, but Colorado voluntarily reduced its number to 51 this year and will be limited to 51 next year.

In addition, the number of coaches who can recruit off campus at any one time must be reduced from seven to six through July 31.

The football program was accused of 53 violations, 51 of them when Neuheisel was Colorado's coach (1995-98). Many involved improper contacts with recruits.

"I want to stress that at no time did I intend to break NCAA regulations, and I never suggested to my staff we operate outside those rules," Neuheisel said in a statement. "I never deceived anyone, nor was I dishonest.

"While being creative in approach, I felt that I was operating within the letter of those rules. It was my mistake to make those judgments without consulting the proper sources at my disposal as a head coach."

The NCAA's infractions committee ruled Colorado didn't properly monitor its football staff.

"This was a serious case in which a football coaching staff, led by the former head football coach, in a calculated attempt to gain a recruiting advantage, pushed beyond the permissible bounds of legislation, resulting in a pattern of recruiting violations," the committee's ruling said.

During a hearing in August, Neuheisel told the committee he and his staff had accidental encounters with prospects on high school campuses but did not gain any recruiting advantage.

However, committee chairman Tom Yeager noted that of the 26 prospective athletes involved, seven eventually enrolled at Colorado.

"There was a recruiting advantage," Yeager said. "And in most instances, these seven athletes were among the top recruits in their respective classes. In the end, the institution benefited."

Other alleged violations included letting recruits keep apparel, improper use of private aircraft and excessive compensation to recruits ranging from $3.20 to $36.76.

Neuheisel said he believed the NCAA used this case to send a message about so-called "bumps," or inadvertent contacts between coaches and recruits.

"The committee's obvious message is that these bumps should no longer be a part of the college football culture," he said.

Gary Barnett, Neuheisel's successor at Colorado, had told the committee that any penalties should follow Neuheisel.

The committee ruled that both Colorado and Neuheisel were at fault, but Yeager said Neuheisel's penalty was meaningful.

"When the head coach of any sport is restricted in the off-campus recruiting process, that is a significant restriction in recruiting," Yeager said.

Colorado athletic director Dick Tharp said the university accepts responsibility because it hired Neuheisel and his staff.

"I'm upset that Gary has to deal with it. But we will manage our way through it," Harp said. "We will continue to upgrade our compliance efforts, and we will not have to deal with these issues in the future."

Colorado still can have the maximum 85 players on scholarship.

Barnett called the impact of the penalties minimal and said he was relieved it wasn't worse.

"If there is any damage, it's more or less a hardship on us as coaches, rather than any damage to the institution or to our program," he said.

Barnett said coaches would write recruits and tell them not to worry.

"To our (current) players and our program, there really are no penalties. They won't notice one bit of difference," he said.

Saturday. The one-two running back punch of Raunny Rosario and R.J. Cobbs each went for 100 yards on the ground. Cobbs scored a pair of touchdowns in the fourth quarter to clinch the victory.

Minuteman quarterback Jeff Krohn completed a 30-yard touchdown pass to senior Adrian Zullo on the first drive of the game. UMass never trailed. Zullo later caught a 29-yard toss from Krohn to paydirt on the first play of the second half.

Zullo ended the day with five catches for 83 yards and two touchdowns, while Krohn completed 14-of-28 pass attempts for 236 yards and a pair of scores.

Playing from behind the entire game, Richmond quarterback D'Arcy Wills was forced to throw the ball more than Coach Jim Reid would have liked. The senior signal-caller completed just 5-of-18 pass attempts. Most of his five completions were big plays, however, as they went for 145 yards and one touchdown.

UMass defensive back Gerard Washington earned Atlantic 10 Rookie of the Week honors after posting 14 tackles (two for a loss), made the first sack of his career, and picked off a Wills pass.

The win at Richmond snapped a seven-game road losing streak for the Minutemen.

what I can do."

"There's never been any idea of rivalry [between them] here or opinion that 'I need more,'" Rudy added.

The dynamic duo also maintained a tough training regimen through the season, something that Nigh says benefited her immensurably.

"The biggest thing that Julie did was that she led by example," she said. "When I came here, I never experienced training that hard, physically or mentally. She showed me that you can't be a lazy goalkeeper; you have to work hard at everything."

Now, with Podhrasky's NCAA eligibility up, Nigh has had her chance to become the Maroon and White's No. 1 goalie, and the bond between the two has changed now from that of teammates to one more of a teacher and student.

"It's kind of funny, I think we have the same relationship, but I just talk a lot more," said Podhrasky, currently a volunteer assistant for the Minutewomen.

So far this season, Nigh, a co-captain for the Maroon and White, has performed solidly in goal, as she anchors the extremely young Minutewoman defense. Although her GAA (2.75 through nine games) is somewhat high, she has racked up an average of 10 saves in each match, good for fourth in the nation.

But Nigh came into the 2002 campaign apprehensive about her new role as one of the team's leaders, until a self-realization came over her in UMass' first match. Against Boston College on Aug. 30, the apprehension she had about this year melted into a sea of confidence.

"There was a chance I wasn't quite up to par because I hadn't had as much experience as Julie," Nigh said. "But during the BC game I said to myself, you can either step back and be hesitant, or you can just step it up and prove to the girls that have never seen you play that you can do it. I think that first game really set the tone about what I need to do for the team."

And not only has she provided quality play on the field, but her leadership skills off the field – especially with freshman netminder Kristen Rutland – have kept the Minutewoman squad together during this roller coaster season.

"I'm trying to hold the same attitude [with Rutland] that Julie had with my own twist, because she was in the same position I was in," Nigh said.

"She's a team player," Rudy said. "She reflected that from the moment she got here, and it's only been embellished over time."

And with a season and a half left in her career, Nigh has even more of an opportunity to leave her mark. Not that she hasn't already.

"I have a big faith in Kelly Nigh in what she can do and where she already is," Podhrasky said. "A lot of times it's just showing her that she's already there."

KEVIN LIMA/COLLEGIAN

Nigh has made 90 saves for a .769 percentage in nine games played for the Minutewomen this year.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) – You can improve your own outlook, and your productivity, simply by accepting current limitations and beginning to work with them willingly.
PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) – You may find yourself entangled in a bittersweet triangle of sorts. Others involved are likely to depend upon you for a solution. But you don't have one. So tell them to ask Jeeves.
ARIES (March 21-April 19) – You must resist the temptation to capitalize on another's misfortune today, despite your need to increase the pace of your progress. Yeah, so you're selfish, who isn't?
TAURUS (April 20-May 20) – You'll want to do things in your own way today – to the extent that others may back away and leave you very much alone for a time. Kind of how the Gremlins left Chunk alone with Sloth. It all works out in the end. Just make sure you have plenty of Rocky Roooooaaaaad!
GEMINI (May 21-June 20) – It's up to you to keep deception out of the picture today. During evening hours, a misunderstanding may bring tensions to the boiling point. Add ice.
CANCER (June 21-July 22) – You may be asked some difficult questions to which there are no hard-and-fast answers. Today, instinct and training work closely together. If you get stuck, just ask Abby.
LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) – You may have to pick up the pace, especially toward mid-day, in order to ten to all the personal business on the docket at this time.
VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) – The starts are favoring your romantic efforts at this time. Take care, however, that you aren't trying to do things the "wrong way around" somehow.
LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) – You'll find yourself embracing things that you had shied away from in days or weeks past. Your attitude is undergoing a change for the better. Once you get yourself laid this weekend, you'll be all set.
SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) – A phone call, letter, telegram or other form of long-distance message is essential to your peace of mind today. Be prepared to receive it. Your grandma's birthday card to you will hold $50.
SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) – Introspection will lead you directly to the door of a new and illuminating truth today. Yes, you were in fact adopted.
CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) – They say love is a two-way street, but today you may have to hog the road in order to make any headway. The Collegian offers one solution: the frats.

ALCS: Twins win first game

By Ronald Blum
ASSOCIATED PRESS

MINNEAPOLIS (AP) — The Minnesota Twins just won't go away. The team that wasn't supposed to make it to opening day isn't a surprise anymore.

Joe Mays shut down Anaheim for eight innings and Corey Koskie hit a go-ahead double Tuesday night, lifting the Twins over the Angels 2-1 in the opener of this improbable AL championship series.

Minnesota	2
Anaheim	1

Before 55,562 screaming, Homer Hanky-waving fans in the Metrodome and with commissioner Bud Selig watching from a luxury suite behind home plate, the Twins signaled the time has come to forget the Yankees, Braves and other big spenders who have dominated the playoffs in recent years.

And they showed just how dominant they are in the Metrodome, improving to 13-2 there in postseason play. Game 2 is in the dome Wednesday night with Rick Reed pitching for the Twins against Ramon Ortiz.

The Metrodome was festive and loud for its biggest night since Oct. 27, 1991, when Jack Morris pitched a 10-inning shutout against Atlanta to win Game 7 of the World Series 1-0. The crowd was on its feet shouting during the key points of the game and throughout the ninth inning.

Baseball owners tried to fold the Twins along with the Montreal Expos last offseason, but were blocked by the Minnesota courts. Since then, the Twins have seemed intent on banging the gavel on all of baseball, wanting to force Selig to hand them the World Series trophy.

"Contract-ula-tions Twins for a superb season/All the way for Bud's sake" read one sign behind home plate.

Anaheim, too, is a surprise to be here. The Angels are seeking their first World Series appearance since joining the major leagues in 1961.

Mays, hit hard by Oakland in Game 2 of the five-game division series, shut down the high-flying Angels, who hit .376 in their four-game victory over the four-time defending league champion Yankees — the highest average by a team in any postseason series.

Mays allowed only four hits and an unearned run caused by an error by shortstop Cristian Guzman, striking out three and walking none in eight innings. Eddie Guardado pitched a hitless ninth for the save.

Anaheim's Kevin Appier, winless in four postseason appearances, pitched almost as well, giving up two runs and five hits in five innings, but it wasn't enough.

Minnesota went ahead in the second when Torii Hunter doubled, advanced on a wild pitch and came home on A.J. Pierzynski's sacrifice fly.

Anaheim tied it in the third on singles by Adam Kennedy and David Eckstein, and the error by Guzman on a grounder by Darin Erstad that stayed down on the slick artificial surface. Minnesota had the fewest errors in the major leagues during the regular season (74) and Anaheim (87) was second in the AL.

Koskie drove in the go-ahead run in the fifth with a double just inside the right-field line after Luis Rivas walked and Guzman singled.

Blue Hens find seam in top rushing defense

The Delaware Blue Hens (3-3, 1-2 Atlantic 10) made a seemingly immovable Northeastern defense look like warm butter in their 27-10 win at Delaware Stadium Saturday.

The Hens put up some impressive numbers against the Husky defense – 91 plays for 427 yards. The Northeastern "D" had been so dominant that, despite giving up 216 yards on the ground Saturday, it is still first in the A-10 in rushing defense, giving up just 61 yards on the ground per game.

Northeastern (4-1, 2-1 A-10) jumped out to an early 10-0 lead on a 33-yard Shawn Brady touchdown pass to William Griffith and a Miro Kesk 24-yard field goal.

But it was all Delaware the rest of the way. The Blue Hens got on the board with 5:44 left in the first half when Antawn Jenkins caught a five-yard TD pass from Andy Hall.

After a Scott Collins 31-yard field goal in the 3rd knotted the contest at 10 apiece, Hall broke the goal line on a one yard sneak for a 17-10 lead. The Blue Hens ran off another 10 unanswered points en route to the win.

Delaware tailback Antawn Jenkins caught a TD pass Saturday vs. NU.

The win improved Delaware to 9-1 all-time against Northeastern. The Blue Hens' lone loss came last year in Brookline.

With the loss, Northeastern falls from a tie with Maine (6-0, 4-0 A-10) for first place to third, behind the Black Bears and the Villanova Wildcats (5-1, 3-1 A-10), who are one win ahead of the Huskies.

There were few bright spots for NU in its loss, but the play of sophomore linebacker Liam Ezekiel certainly was one. Ezekiel registered 22 tackles, the most by a Northeastern player in 17 years. The mark was just one shy of a school record, set by Shawn O'Malley against Maine on Nov. 2, 1985. Ezekiel's mark is good for tops in the conference for the year and earned him the Atlantic 10 Defensive Player of the Week award for the first time in his career.

The contest marked the 1,000th in Delaware football history.

He's pretty good

Villanova quarterback Brett Gordon was named A-10 Offensive Player of the Week for the second straight week after a leading his team to a 35-7 drubbing of Hofstra. 'Nova scored the first 35 points of the contest, with Gordon connecting with four different receivers for touchdowns in the first half.

Gordon ended the day having completed 26-of-33 pass attempts for 254 yards with the four touchdown passes. He was named Player of the Week last week after leading the Wildcats to a 30-26 win over James Madison. The senior completed 40-of-57 passes for 421 yards and four touchdowns. The completions and attempts were career highs, while the game marked the third time he has thrown for over 400 yards in a game.

Gordon leads the A-10 in every major passing category, including passing efficiency (149.2), touchdown passes (15), completion percentage (67.7), yards passing (1782).

Stepping into the light

Kelly Nigh's patience has finally paid off

By Andy Vogt

JAMES SCHAFFER/COLLEGIAN

While playing three sports in high school, UMass goalkeeper Kelly Nigh recieved 2000 Seattle Times Female Athlete of the Year honors.

Sitting on the bench can be a grueling experience for any hungry, competitive collegiate athlete. The desire to play, to show your coach and your teammates what you're capable of, grows stronger each day as the waiting continues.

For Kelly Nigh, the waiting is finally over.

Relegated primarily to a role of cheerleader for her first two years on the Massachusetts women's soccer team, the resilient Nigh now has a chance to prove her pre-college accolades were well-deserved.

"I knew that my time would come, so I wasn't worried about playing time," Nigh said.

A three-sport athlete in Seattle that earned her 2000 Seattle Times Female Athlete of the Year honors, she wowed the Minutewoman coaching staff at the 1999 Miami Orange Classic with a jaw-dropping performance. In the championship game, Nigh turned aside a ridiculous three out of five penalty kicks to garner tournament MVP honors and lead her Emerald City Premier Club team to the title.

Her stellar display in Miami sparked interest by the UMass program, but it was a phone call to Head Coach Jim Rudy that paved her road across the country to Amherst. Amy Allmann, one of Rudy's former players at Central Florida, had previously trained with Nigh and had nothing but glowing remarks about the 5-foot-9 keeper.

"Amy really sold me on her," Rudy said.

Coming into Nigh's freshman year, the Minutewomen had two keepers that had never donned maroon and white jerseys, but Nigh's counterpart had the benefit of two years of college action. Experience overruled youth, and Julie Podhrasky, a transfer from Clemson University, earned the starting position after the pre-season.

"When I came in as a freshman, I had no expectations," Nigh said. "Julie had two years experience at Clemson, so when she was playing more than me, it wasn't a disappointment. We came in together, and I actually liked it better that way."

While Podhrasky received the bulk of the playing time, Nigh still had opportunities to show the same brilliance she displayed in Miami. In her 584 minutes of action over eight games, she posted a microscopic 0.31 goals against average to complement her 4-0-1 record with two shutouts.

It was during her freshman year in which Nigh had her most memorable game – a game through which she was able to build confidence for the remainder of her collegiate career. In a tight match with San Diego State, Nigh was entrusted to enter at halftime and finish the job for the Minutewomen. With her family in the stands, she made several key saves as UMass pulled out a 2-1 win over the Aztecs.

"It wasn't like 'uh-oh, we're not up six goals, you can't go in,'" Nigh said with a laugh. "It felt like it was all coming together as far as my college career."

One would think that with that kind of first-year resume, Nigh could expect her role to increase during her sophomore season. But she actually saw a significantly reduced amount of playing time (315 minutes) as Podhrasky overtook the vast majority of action in goal for the Minutewomen.

To be fair, Podhrasky was also rather impressive in net, as her 1.31 GAA in 16 games earned her Atlantic 10 Defensive Player of the Year and All-A-10 First Team honors. But despite Nigh's glowing numbers in 2000, she wasn't flustered by seeing her minutes decrease.

"I don't like to quantify playing time, because there is only one goalkeeper that can be on the field," Nigh said. "It was Julie's senior year, and she was known throughout the region as a great goalkeeper. I think it was a great asset to our team, because it strikes fear in other teams when they know they have this goalkeeper they have to face."

Keeping one's attention on a match can be rather difficult for those on the sidelines, especially goalkeepers. But with the knowledge that at any moment, she could be called upon to enter a game, Nigh finds that a strong state of mind is a key aspect of being a top-tier backstop.

"There's a certain amount of focus that comes with being a goalkeeper, because even in a game, you could be out of [it] for 89 minutes, and all of the sudden you've got to be on your toes and ready to go," Nigh said.

"It's the same way with being a backup," she added. "You have to come to the game being prepared to play even though you might know you're not going to."

With two talented players battling for goalkeeping supremacy, egos can clash, but the tandem remained friends throughout the two years. Both players worked hard in practice, never allowing jealousy or competitiveness to enter into their relationship.

"I don't direct my competitiveness to a person, so it wasn't focused on Kelly," Podhrasky said. "It was more that I need to go in and prove Nigh defends the net and makes a beautiful diving save. She has made similar stops all year long, placing her fourth in the nation in saves per game with 10.0, despite her team's roller coaster play.

The Legends Room inside Boston's Fleet Center has itself in a stir. More than half the nametags lay unclaimed on the check-in table but reporters, television crews and radio personalities are already scrambling for some potent quotables.

Hockey East Media Day is a mosh-pit of media guides and reporters' pads, until a calm breaks the doorway.

Past the statues of retired Beantown legends Bobby Orr and Larry Bird walks one of the non-retired types, Boston U. coach Jack Parker. The 57-year-old Parker is sewn together as neatly as a wedding day tux, even as the room's attentions turns to him.

Not phased by the media bull rush, Parker shakes hands and chases each of his responses with a swig of serenity. With a slight adjustment to his sport coat, he addresses his Terriers' lack of offensive punch. A touch on his silver hair dismisses the credibility of the pre-season poll that tabs his team number one.

Each journalist's proddings are swiftly turned to cowering clichés until the crowd begins to breakup.

The scene looks all clear until the rook of the media throng is late arriving with a final query.

"Who is the best player in Hockey East?" he lets slip off in a Southie tongue.

Almost awakened by it, Parker offers an answer.

"Ben Eaves."

And another.

"Nolan Schaefer."

And another.

"Colin Hemingway."

As he realizes his response has leaked into babbling, Parker is a bit shaken and begins to sling his words together like an Erector Set.

Parker would have been just as accurate looking under his nose at Terrier defenseman Ryan Whitney. Or down Commonwealth Avenue as dashing NU forward Mike Ryan. Or westbound on the Mass Pike at UMass' Greg Mauldin.

But to a matter such as this, there is no correct answer. So let the debate begin. The best player in Hockey East is...

Carr addresses Senate

JAMES SCHAFFER/DAILY COLLEGIAN

Senate Speaker Dan Saunders addresses the student government body before appointing Student Government Association committee leaders.

By Kristin Shrewsbury
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Committee members and chairs were assigned at last night's Student Government Association Senate meeting. An Executive Cabinet wish list of campus goals was also delivered.

President Dave Carr addressed the Senate explaining ideas that the Executive Cabinet has toward the future of the University of Massachusetts, as well as what changes will be happening.

Ideas surrounding a possible new Student Union and Campus Center, looking at the contract for the Text Book Annex and Campus Store, as well as working with YCMP (Your Campus Meal Plan) to get students the maximum amount of meals when used on campus were expressed.

"How many people think that we pay too much for books?" Carr asked the Senate. "I think paying $62 for a UMass sweatshirt is ridiculous and they are looking to extend the contract with Follet for five more years after it's expiration in 2005."

Carr further explained that the Executive Cabinet met with Ashoke Ganguli, Director of Auxiliary Services, and that he was very receptive to the ideas of a new Student Union and Campus Center.

"The plans for a new Student Union are drawn up and in my office right now," Carr said. "If we're going to spend $65 million on a new recreational facility, why not spend it on a new Student Union and Campus Center and put money into something that will generate money. Right now we barely break even on a daily basis."

However, Senators and others questioned the thought of a new Student Union and Campus Center, expressing that they felt the money should go elsewhere.

"Why spend money on a new Student Union, we already have one," former Senator and Senior Political Science/Journalism major Ashley Dolan said. "I'd rather see the Library stay open past 11 p.m., or the elevators get fixed so they are safe. Why not get security back on campus so I can feel safe when I walk around at night?"

Carr however stated that the plans are just a proposal and that nothing has been close to officially decided yet. Carr continued by stating that a few changes have taken place, specifically focusing on a new ATM that will be put in the Southwest Residential Area come this spring or following fall semester.

"They found a company that will put the ATM in Southwest and they put a bid on the structure it would be in, but were waiting to find out if it will be a bidding process, or if they will let them build it based on solo bidding," Carr said. "The problem with Massachusetts is that they have a bid system, so now were just waiting, but hopefully it will be in this spring, and if we have to wait longer we're hoping for next fall."

Committee allocations and committee chair assignments were also on last night's agenda. Members of the SGA expressed the importance of the role of Chair.

"You are all facing a big choice, you get to choose your field generals, the Chair of your committee," Student Trustee Bill Powers said. "These people will be who you look to with questions and who will lead your motions in and out of Senate. I hope you choose the best candidate and consider all the hard work that goes into it."

Committee's were assigned shortly after announcements, as the Senate committees voted on their prospective chairs. The five committees met and elected their new chairs. Chair of Administrative Affairs is Chris Eckel, Chair of Public Policy and Relations is Adrienne Girad, Chair of University Policy is Blake Kleppe, Chair of Ways and Means is Brian Thompson and Chair of the Finance committee is Patrick Higgins.

"I'm so excited to be the new Chair of Ways and Means and my committee is pumped and ready to go to work," Thompson said. "I'm hopeful we'll get a great budget to work with this year."

Administrative Affairs got to put their power into affect last night as they approved five new members to the Senate. Four of the newly elected Senators represent the Commuter district and the fifth representing Southwest at Large district.

"I'm very, very excited that we have committees and qualified Chairs to run them," Speaker Dan Saunders said. "There is a lot of energy and good ideas. I'm very excited that other individuals saw the opportunities in Senate and jumped into it and got involved."

Man slain in Va.

Authorities investigate seventh casualty in D.C. serial sniper case

By David Crary
ASSOCIATED PRESS

BALTIMORE (AP) - A man was shot dead while pumping gas in Virginia on Wednesday night, and police were trying to determine whether he was the latest victim of the sniper who has terrorized the Washington area for a week. Meanwhile, a tarot card with the words "Dear policeman, I am God" emerged as a potential clue.

Virginia State Police said two males were seen driving away in a white vehicle after the shooting at the station in Prince William County, near Manassas, 25 miles west of the nation's capital.

Prince William County police spokeswoman Sgt. Kim Chinn said one man was killed. Chinn said she had few details to release. She said police did not know where the shots came from, or how many shots were fired.

Police had blocked off several streets around the gas station, and they were interviewing people at the scene.

"We are still very preliminarily beginning this investigation," Chinn said.

"We have been in contact with the officials from Maryland and the task force there, so we are sharing any information we have."

Montgomery County Police Chief Charles Moose also wouldn't comment when asked about the tarot card, and angrily suggested unapproved information had been leaked.

"I need to make sure I don't do anything to hinder our ability to bring this person or these people into custody," Moose said.

FBI memo details surveillance lapses

By Ted Bridis
ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON (AP) - FBI agents illegally videotaped suspects, intercepted e-mails without court permission and recorded the wrong phone conversations during sensitive terrorism and espionage investigations, according to an internal memorandum detailing serious lapses inside the FBI more than a year before the Sept. 11 attacks.

The blunders – roughly 15 over the first three months of 2000 – were never made public but garnered the attention of the "highest levels of management" inside FBI, said the memo written by senior bureau lawyers and obtained by The Associated Press.

Lawmakers reviewing FBI missteps preceding the terror attacks expressed surprise Wednesday at the extent of errors detailed in the memo, which focused on sensitive cases requiring warrants under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act.

The mistakes extend beyond those criticized in a rare public decision this summer by the secretive U.S. court that oversees the surveillance warrants. That court admonished the FBI for providing inaccurate information in warrant applications.

The April 2000 memo – marked "immediate" and classified as "secret" – describes different problems from those cited by the court. It describes agents conducting unauthorized searches, writing warrants with wrong addresses and allowing "overruns" of electronic surveillance operations beyond their legal deadline.

"The level of incompetence here is egregious," said Rep. William D. Delahunt, D-Mass., a member of the House Judiciary Committee who obtained the memo from the FBI and provided it to AP.

Said Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt.: "Honest mistakes happen in law enforcement, but the extent, variety and seriousness of the violations recounted in this FBI memo show again that the secret FISA process breeds sloppiness unless there's adequate oversight."

The FBI's deputy general counsel, whose office approves requests for national security warrants, acknowledged Wednesday the mistakes led to broad concern inside his agency long before Congress began investigating whether the bureau missed signs of Sept. 11.

"There's always going to be mistakes," said M.E. "Spike" Bowman. "We looked at those incidents very, very hard. We found no common thread. A lot of it was inattention to detail."

These warrants are among the most powerful tools in the U.S. antiterrorism arsenal, permitting secret searches and wiretaps for up to one year without ever notifying the target of the investigation.

The court approved 1,012 such warrants in 2000.

Bowman said the FBI's Office of Professional Responsibility investigated the problems. No FBI agent lost his or her job as a result of the internal inquiry. Bowman said, and the FBI has not had the same number of mistakes since. It averages now about 10 mistakes a year in such cases, he said.

The FBI also notified the U.S. court about the warrant problems, and the response from judges was "a lot of head scratching over how this could happen," Bowman said.

"It's important to understand that government doesn't abuse these secret authorities we get," Bowman said. The FBI has never detected an agent intentionally violating a special surveillance warrant, he added.

Lawmakers approved changes last year under the USA Patriot Act giving new powers to use these special terrorism and espionage warrants. But some lawmakers have since complained they were not adequately informed of problems under the old rules.

"As the Justice Department pushes the Congress for more powers, we should first be sure that these problems are being corrected and that existing laws are being used responsibly," Leahy said.

Delahunt predicted Congress will press the Bush administration for explanations about such mistakes before it is asked to extend new surveillance powers from the Patriot Act set to expire in December 2005.

The memo cites examples in specific cases ordinarily kept from public view.

It describes the FBI eavesdropping on conversations long after the subject of one surveillance gave up a cell phone and its number was reassigned to an innocent person.

The new owner spoke a different language than the FBI's target, and an interpreter notified investigators. FBI agents did nothing "for a substantial period of time" and failed to report the problem to headquarters, the memo says.

The memo, which was approved by then-FBI Deputy Director Thomas Pickard and other senior officials, also describes agents in other cases videotaping a meeting of suspects and intercepting e-mails without the court's permission.

Bowman said that in one instance, FBI agents searched a storage locker even though they did not have permission in the warrant; an earlier, expired warrant had included permission to search the same locker. He said that in other cases, telephone recording equipment was not shut off at the time specified by the warrant.

Another memo from the same period, disclosed months ago under a Freedom of Information Act lawsuit, described the FBI mistakenly intercepting e-mails of innocent citizens during an investigation in Denver by its Osama bin Laden Unit and International Terrorism Operations Section.

It indicated the FBI incorrectly used its "Carnivore" Internet surveillance software, now called "DCS-1000," and captured too many e-mails. That memo's author wrote to Bowman that describing an oversight official at the Justice Department as unhappy about the incident "would be an understatement of incredible proportions."

UMass prowler captured

By Dan Lamothe
COLLEGIAN STAFF

University of Massachusetts Police apprehended a suspect late Tuesday night after a foot chase. The man reportedly had been entering students' rooms in Crampton and Prince Dormitories in the Southwest Area of the campus.

According to spokesman Jim Lyons, police officials believe that the individual is the same person responsible for breaking and entering into students' rooms in both Mary Lyon and Field Dormitories of the Northeast and Orchard Hill residential living areas, respectively.

Two students entered their rooms Tuesday night and confronted the man, Robert J. Thompson, Jr., 53, of Springfield, Mass. They escorted him out of the building.

Student Security officers and students living in Crampton and Prince called at 9:54 p.m. The first UMPD officer arrived on the scene at 9:57 p.m. Shortly thereafter, Thompson was apprehended and arrested. Police believe his motive for entering students' rooms was theft of personal properties.

Thompson faces charges of breaking and entering In the nighttime. He was also held on two previous warrants for his arrest.

"It was a very good arrest on the part of the officers responding," Lyons said. "Their responding time was under three minutes."

Lyons said that the result of the incident came from students making the call in a timely fashion. "We're trying to encourage students to call it in. This is what we want," he said.

If the police are right in their deduction that Thompson was the prowler found in Mary Lyon and Field, Thompson has been the subject of two previous public safety alerts released by UMPD. The previous safety alerts were issued after several incidents on the weekend of Sept. 28.

In the first incident reported, a female resident in Mary Lyon said that while she was out of her room and upstairs for a few minutes, a light-skinned black male entered her room at around 3 p.m. Sept. 28. Allegedly, the man in the room was drunk. He asked her to use the phone. She said it was broken and the man left.

The UMPD Detectives Department released a composite sketch of the suspect after the original incident. Two more students, one from Field and another from Mary Lyon, came forward within the past ten days to report separate incidents.

The student in Field reported being walked in on at around 5 p.m. on Sept. 28. The second resident in Mary Lyon reported being walked in on at 4 p.m. Sept. 27. In both incidents, the students were in their rooms when the suspect entered their rooms and he left immediately.

UMPD police forces issued a second composite sketch combining the descriptions that the three students gave them. That sketch was released as the second public safety alert late last week.

Law enforcement agencies on campus continue to stress the need to call 911 immediately after coming into contact like these. They do not encourage confronting individuals like the two male students did Tuesday night when the escorted Thompson out of the building.

UMPD has set up several ways to relay important information in a timely manner such as was done on Tuesday night. Information can be relayed to the Detective Bureau at 545-0893. Anonymous tips can be sent to police forces through the UMPD Tips Hotline, 577-TIPS, or sent through email to the UMass web site, www.umass.edu/umpd.

Massachusetts Republican gubernatorial candidate Mitt Romney, left, greets business leaders from across Massachusetts on the statehouse steps in Boston after they endorsed his candidacy on Wednesday

Romney sets aggressive tone

By John McElhenny
ASSOCIATED PRESS

BOSTON (AP) - Republican gubernatorial candidate Mitt Romney set an aggressive tone in the hours before Wednesday's debate, questioning Democrat Shannon O'Brien's qualifications and launching a new television ad critical of her record.

Romney, a former venture capitalist and Winter Olympic chief, said O'Brien's management as state treasurer and her oversight of the state's pension fund "has not been stellar," and he said it's no time for O'Brien "to learn on the job how the economy works."

"I've been in the investment business myself," Romney said in a Statehouse news conference with various business leaders. "I'd have gotten fired had I managed pension funds the way the pension fund in Massachusetts has been managed the last several years."

A spokesman for O'Brien said the $26 billion pension fund has suffered in recent months along with the rest of the stock market, but has risen $1.8 billion in value since O'Brien took office in 1999.

"Everyone who owns stock or has a 401K understands the stock market has taken a beating," said the spokesman, Adrian Durbin. "Shannon's management of the pension fund has been strong."

The two candidates were to face off in a televised debate on Wednesday night that for the first time in the campaign would feature all five candidates who will appear on the Nov. 5 ballot.

Libertarian Carla Howell, Green Jill Stein and independent Barbara Johnson had been excluded from the first two debates, in Springfield and Worcester.

Another debate was scheduled with all five candidates in two weeks. Only Romney and O'Brien were scheduled to appear in a fifth debate on Oct. 29.

On Wednesday, hours before the debate began in WLVI-TV's Boston studios, Romney's campaign aired a new television ad that says O'Brien voted for "billions in higher taxes on cars, income and gas."

"Shannon O'Brien has been part of the mess on Beacon Hill for 12 years," the ad says. "Mitt Romney has the independence to bring change."

Durbin, O'Brien's spokesman, said Romney was going back on a pledge to run a positive campaign.

"It's a desperate move by a campaign that's struggling to gain any traction," Durbin said.

Lombardi to bestow awards

Madeline Blais, a past recipient of the prestigious Pulitzer Prize award, was honored with a Chancellor's Medal in 2001.

By Emily Carroll
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

The University of Massachusetts will be honoring this year's recipients of its highest honor, the Chancellor's Medal, tomorrow at 11:30 a.m. in the Campus Center. The ceremony and luncheon will be followed by remarks from Chancellor John V. Lombardi.

The recipients of this year's award are Ronald M. Ansin, businessman and philanthropist in Harvard Mass., Faith Gabelnick, president of Pacific University; Paul Kelliher of the UMass Isenberg School of Management's Business Advisory Council; Charles H. Manley, Vice President for science and technology at Takasago International Corporation; Robert S. Peterkin director of the Urban Superintendents program; Paul Shuldiner of the UMass Civil and Environmental Engineering Department; Bay State Medical Center and Cooley Dickinson Hospital.

The Chancellor's Medal recognizes individual accomplishments in areas including intellectual and professional achievement, as well as contributions to UMass and society in general. The Chancellor chooses the recipients based on recommendations submitted by the University, schools and colleges.

Ansin is a supporter of the College of Social and Behavioral Sciences at UMass. His multi-year contributions to the College have proved instrumental in raising study abroad opportunities to its present essential component status in the Colleges global education requirement.

Gabelnick, originally from Forest Grove, Oregon, held teaching positions at American University and the University of Maryland before becoming Pacific University president in 1995. U.S. News and World Report recognized Gabelnick for her efforts at Pacific University and also rated the school among the best colleges and best values in 2002. Gabelnick has focused her efforts on the role of women as leaders, creating and maintaining learning organizations, and the study of institutional transformation.

Kelliher, a member of the Accounting Alumni Advisory Committee, is credited with being an active member for the $26 million campaign for the Isenberg School of management as well as an individual donor. Kelliher, from Leeds, Mass., is also a member of the board, and past chairman of Business Friends of the Arts in Springfield; is vice chairman of Junior Achievement of Western Massachusetts, and is a director of the Economic Development Council of Pioneer Valley and Westmass Development Corporation.

Manley has served as V.P. for science and technology at Takasago International Corporation for the past 14 years and also currently serves as a member of the Industrial Board of Advisors to the Food Science Department of UMass. Texas A&M, Institute of Food Science and Technology, and the Center for Advanced Food Technology at Rutgers University. Manley, from Ringwood, NJ is a lecturer, author, and editor of many publications in the flavor ingredient chemistry and safety area.

Peterkin, director of the Urban Superintendents program, is also chair of programs in administration, planning and social policy at the Harvard Graduate School of Education. Peterkin, a Cambridge, Mass. resident, served as superintendent of the Cambridge and Milwaukee, WI Public School Districts.

Shuldiner has been on the UMass Civil and Environmental Engineering Department faculty for over thirty years. Since 1999 he has been director of the UMass Transportation Center, which has promoted study in all facets of transportation with much focus on UMass. Shuldiner is also director of the Baystate Roads Program.

Baystate Medical Center (BMC) will be recognized for its aid to the UMass School of Nursing during a particular time of need within the profession of health care and nursing. BMC also houses the Elizabeth Battey Marchese Memorial Scholarship that supports School of Nursing students. In the past academic year BMC has awarded $170,000 in scholarships.

Lastly, Cooley Dickinson Hospital (CDH) will also be honored. CDH has launched partnerships with the UMass School of Nursing. This partnership allows the Nursing school to sponsor faculty members, with one faculty member serving as a clinical educator to work with UMass students. Through help from this hired faculty, the staff is given the opportunity to develop ties (and build up mentoring programs) with middle school and high school counselors in the area.

Attendance to this ceremony is by invitation only.

Chancellor John V Lombardi will be presenting the Chancellors Medal tomorrow to faculty members who have displayed significant intellectual and professional achievements and made significant contributions to society.

One Sweet Whirled to promote voting and awareness

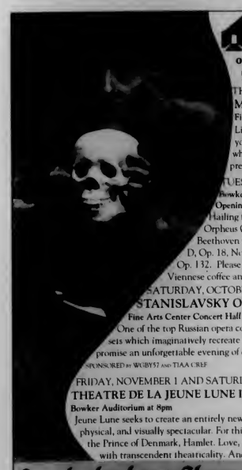
By Jamie Loo
COLLEGIAN STAFF

MassPIRG and the Student Coalition for Education Research and Advocacy (SCERA) are joining up with the One Sweet Whirled Campaign this Thursday and Friday, from 10a.m.-4p.m. outside on the Student Union lawn, to register students to vote and to promote global awareness.

The One Sweet Whirled campaign is a collaboration with Ben and Jerry's Ice Cream, the Dave Matthews Band and twenty national and international environmental groups to raise awareness about global warming. The tour began in Boston this week and will make its way across the country to California. One of the goals of the campaign is to get people to make pledges to reduce their carbon dioxide emission levels at their website, www.onesweetwhirled.org.

"Pledges are things such as car pooling or taking public transportation instead of driving," said Tim Roberts, a member of MassPIRG.

Along with information on global warming there will also be various games where students will have the chance to win Dave Matthews Band t-shirts and CDs. MassPIRG and SCERA will have a table next to One Sweet Whirled to register students to vote. This is their third voter registration effort this semester. Earlier in the semester MassPIRG and SCERA went door-to-door in Southwest and in Upper Central. They are also holding a contest with community leaders to get their residents to register, and the floor that gets the most people will win a pizza party. Adriennne Girard, a member of SCERA, said they've already registered at least 500 students on campus.



"It's been pretty fun so far. Our next big thing is getting students to the polls on Nov. 5," said Girard.

In addition to the gubernatorial race, there will also be three referendum questions on the November ballot. The questions are about the state income tax, bilingual education and the clean elections law which the groups hope will encourage more students to vote. Girard said that they are also encouraging students who are already registered to vote to get absentee ballots. Sabrina Morano, the student coordinator for SCERA said they are already working on strategies to get students out to vote by possibly getting vans to bring students to polling places and by actively educating students about the candidates and referendum questions.

"It will be great if we get students to register, but the important thing is getting students to go out and vote," said Morano.

Working together

to keep everyone safe

Investigators from the George's County Police Department confirmed yesterday that a note reading, "Dear policeman, I am God," had been left by the sniper tied to the recent shootings in Maryland, which have left six individuals dead and an additional two wounded.

The message was scrawled on a Tarot card known as the Death card, and was found alongside a bullet casing in the woods outside the school where a 13-year-old boy was shot Monday morning. It's the first communication between authorities and the suspect.

The shootings have caused schools in the surrounding communities and counties to continue on in "lockdown" mode, with nearly all outdoor activities and afternoon sessions moved indoors or cancelled all together.

Area business have taken similar steps, particularly restaurants, in closing the outdoors portions of their services until further notice.

And then there are the citizens and general populous, whose habits, professions and lives insist that they continue on. For these individuals, there are no lockdowns, no safe indoor venues in which their lives can be staged. The only certainty they have is, of course, an enormous uncertainty that draws potentially fatal conclusions.

That fear has, as with most cases of public concern, sparked a new interest in community strength and oneness. Though the authorities attached to the case are doing a fine job of relaying information and responding to situations as appropriately as the unique situations have allowed for, in the end it's the communities that are being attacked, and it will be the communities that want to bond and strike back.

Investigators have opened help lines, and made public various forums that individuals with pertinent information can attend. In a situation like this, it's the right decision; the public needs to feel that it can take a proactive stance and share the knowledge and information it has.

To bring it to a level we all can relate to, consider it in terms of your own community, which is, if you're reading this, the University of Massachusetts and surrounding Five-College area. The repeated reports of prowlers and sexual assaults on campus have spurred the community on to a heightened sense of awareness. You want the best for yourself, your friends and neighbors in general. You do not want to sit idly while thing fall apart around you. It's human nature and it's absolutely essential that it be addressed.

The authorities and community members in Maryland have been working hard to meet that demand. The force they're up against is an invisible one, further complicating an already difficult situation. Both sides have vowed to catch the individual. When that does happen, it will be as it should:

Together, with the best interests of everyone in mind.

Looking out for each other

JAMIE LOO

This is a sick world that we live in. Someone is terrorizing Montgomery County, Maryland. Six people are dead and two people are wounded. And all over the time span of one week. The latest victim is a 13 year-old student.

Why?

Nobody knows. The latest news is that a tarot card was found in the woods not far from the Tasker Middle School next to a shell casing that read, "Dear Policemen, I am God."

The whole situation is disgusting. The shootings have caused a ripple effect of fear in Montgomery County, as normally busy places such as parks, are left empty, and customers at shopping areas hurry between the store to their cars. The first victim was shot to death in the parking lot of a grocery store. Another victim was just mowing his lawn. Two were injured at a gas station. And then there was the woman, who was quietly sitting on a bench outside of the town post office. To shot at random, with no motive found yet. There is no justice in any of this, and the newest shock has been brought to the most recent victim, 13.

The shooting of the young victim has prompted many schools in the area to keep children in doors during recess. Attendance at the Tasker middle school was down one third on Tuesday morning following the incident. Sadly, we can't keep our children indoors forever. Keeping them indoors isn't going to make the perpetrator go away.

I remember that all too well. For the record, I haven't seen half the violence that many of my friends have growing up in New York or Boston, but believe me I've had my fair share, but that's a column for a different time. I grew up in Randolph Massachusetts. It's a medium sized town on the South Shore, fifteen minutes from Boston, situated next to the famous "Rex" and has that "really big movie theater." When I was 12, there was a smattering of gang violence rising between high school students in my town and nearby Brockton. There were two drive-by shooting threats to the school early in the fall, all of which was gossip in the junior high school hallway. All of the students took it seriously, however none of our teachers or the headmaster would address the issue until there was a clear threat.

One day in October, there was word that this time the gangs in Brockton meant business. We were dismissed from school half an hour early and after school activities were all cancelled. The headmaster told everyone that no one was allowed to be anywhere near the school and warned students to go home and not to stay uptown. When I left the school to get onto the bus it was obvious why. There were police cruisers surrounding the school. The bus was dead silent on the ride home. I remember feeling scared and angry that this was happening at my school. I was scared that someone was actually going to get killed. Nothing happened. No one showed up that bright October day to shoot students at my school.

I can't say that I can empathize with the students at Tasker Middle School, because one of my classmates was never wounded and put into the hospital. I wish I could get in the mind of this sniper and find out why? What gives him/her the right to take lives at random and ruin many more in the process?

Living in fear sucks. We know this all too well following Sept. 11. It's a feeling of being absolutely powerless, with no choice but to wait for justice. It's a sad reminder that violence can happen anywhere. Silver Springs and Bowie are not big cities like New York or Los Angeles. On this campus we aren't fully protected either. Every year there are a few incidents on campus that make us a little more nervous to walk home and to carry on with our daily lives. We can't be running scared constantly. We are not powerless in the fight against violence at UMass or in our communities. It's as simple as watching out for each other and watching for things that are out of place. The dormitory prowler was just caught because two students saw someone suspicious in their building. I can't stress enough what a service that is to other students. FBI profilers say this sniper is probably someone who lives in Montgomery County area, which means he/she could be anyone's neighbor. It's possible this could have been prevented. It's all about being careful and watchful, otherwise none of us will ever be able to take our communities back. I don't blame the citizens of Montgomery County for hiding. I would be afraid too. But they can't hide forever.

An issue for drivers and pedestrians

PETER TROVATO

I almost killed him; he came out of nowhere and I almost ran him over with my car. I was traveling on Massachusetts Ave., the street adjacent to the Haigis Mall, around 9 p.m. I was wide-awake, paying close attention to the road, the radio not even turned on and suddenly a figure appeared in a crosswalk as if he had been "beamed down" by Scotty from the Enterprise. The person was strolling in the crosswalk without a care in the world, his arms swaying and feet lightly scuffing the ground. All while my two-ton car is barreling in his direction about to send him into next week. And I am panicking. I immediately move my foot the brakes causing my car to screech but come to a stop right before the white lines of the crosswalk. Now, this fortunate fellow stares at my headlights, gives me a wave and continues his slow gait to the end of the crosswalk and onto the sidewalk. My heart is racing and I tentatively hit the gas and continue along the road. If I had hit this person it would have been the third crosswalk accident in less than two months of school being in session.

But I didn't hit this person, so our count remains at two. Friday Sept. 23, a student was the victim of a driver's impatience and was hit while in the crosswalk. The following Friday, yet another individual was struck by a car in the crosswalk; the specifics of this accident were not given out.

This is an ongoing safety issue here at the University. The crosswalks have always been a dangerous feature of the campus. Students, who live in Southwest, are constantly crossing the street in an effort to reach their classes across campus and traffic is backed up several cars deep during peak times of crossing. Cars will often try to maneuver through the crosswalk in between students, beep their horn for students to cross in a timely fashion, and some simply don't stop at all. And this is where accidents occur.

But who is to blame for accidents occurring in the crosswalk? The natural response is to blame the driver of the car. The law states that pedestrians have the right of way when in the crosswalk. Therefore, legally, any time a person is hit in the crosswalk the driver is to blame. And in most of the cases reported, especially the case on Sept. 23, it is the driver's fault. However, are the students of UMass taking their crosswalk rights too far?

Yes. And it is time to address the issue. We all grew up, I assume, being told to look both ways before we cross the street. A car, maybe not legally but certainly realistically, has the right of way when it comes to the road. Many students on this campus seem to believe that once they are in the crosswalk they are safe from being struck by automobiles. Students should be safe in crosswalks, but come on – lets not be naive. The crosswalk does not form an invisible force field that magically deflects anything entering the white lines.

Without a doubt, there are many students who buy into this idea that they are free from harm when in a crosswalk. They enter the crosswalk with their headphones blasting and their head down. There is no cautionary glance up and down the street to see if there is any traffic coming; they just walk right out into oncoming traffic and expect the cars to stop.

> "Cars will often try to maneuver through the crosswalk in between students, beep their horn for students to cross in a timely fashion, and some simply don't stop at all. And this is where accidents occur."

At night, this problem is worse. The crosswalks are not well lit and at some points around campus the tree growth hinders a driver's ability to see someone entering the crosswalk. But every weekend it's the same story: large packs of students walking to parties or to their cars will throw themselves into the crosswalks with the idea that they have reached the promised land of street crossing safety. The crosswalk: a place of peace and harmony, where anyone can cross freely and do whatever they feel without the worry of automobiles striking them unexpectedly and sending them to the hospital. Wrong. If you are in the street, whether there are white lines or not, you can be hit by a car. Look before you cross the street.

This is as much an issue for students as it is an issue for the safety officials of UMass. Students have to take a trip back to kindergarten and learn how to cross the street properly, but also, safety officials have to do a better job of making the crosswalks less dangerous. The crosswalks have to be well lit; there are several crosswalks around campus that become extremely dangerous at night because of poor visibility. Maybe blinking yellow lights at every crosswalk is the answer; maybe stop signs at the most dangerous crosswalks are the answer; dare I say stop signs at every cross walk? Obviously, traffic will get worse, but at least students will be safe from accidents.

What will it take for students and officials to realize that there is a major safety issue with crosswalks on this campus? Will it take another fatal accident like the case in 1999? After this accident a traffic signal was installed where the accident occurred. This traffic signal addressed the problem, just a bit too late. The truth is the crosswalks are not marked enough with lights and students typically walk into the white lines without caution. Safety officials must take action, but the students must take even more action. Action against themselves; as students we have to be responsible when crossing the street. It seems like a childish request that was once uttered to us by camp counselors and elementary school teachers, but the white lines of the crosswalk do not form white walls of safety. And many students are under the impression that they do and because of this accidents occur.

The figure that suddenly appeared in the crosswalk that night, which I talked about above, escaped harm because my car was equipped with sufficient brakes. I didn't go out that night planning on hitting someone in the crosswalk, nor do most drivers, but it almost happened. I came inches away from taking another human's life. If the crosswalk was appropriately lit and the pedestrian used a little more common sense this could have been avoided. Unfortunately, unless things change, stories like mine will not have fortunate endings. Instead, they will be sorrowful and tragic, with severe consequences. How many disasters or near disasters are going to take place before there are changes? Does someone else have to die in the crosswalk before precautions are made and students start thinking before they cross the street? It seems to take a large tragedy to cause change around this campus; I sure hope I am not the person to change the crosswalk problem on campus – because I'll either be in the hospital or even worse: dead.

Students speak out on the war

A war to defend freedom

You know what really pisses me off? When I am walking around campus and I see a bunch of hippies barefoot and beating on drums with big signs saying that what we are doing to Afghanistan is wrong or going to Iraq will not solve anything. If I were in charge of this country you would be the first people to get sent into battle.

It is so amazing to me that after what happened to our country on Sept. 11 people could really protest military action. Our military is what defends our freedom. Our brothers and sisters are overseas to protect your right to walk down the street and beat those annoying drums and to not wear shoes around town. Instead of supporting the people who defend the freedom of this country you protest what they are doing for all of us. Our military protects the freedom of speech that allows you to actually dishonor our great nation by voicing your support against a just cause.

I am not affiliated with the United States Military, but I have the greatest respect for those who serve our country. I will not be the one running through 110-degree desert with fifty pounds of weapons and supplies to carry while wearing pants, a jacket, combat boots, and a helmet and at the same time, dodging bullets and bombs from countries who harbor and support terrorism.

I have two brothers at UMass who will most likely be leaving to defend the USA. They are both full time students who I am sure would love the finish up the semester and they cannot because they will be heeding the call of the President. So while they are away defending this country in hundred degree deserts, you can rally on a nice cool October day with out your shoes and with your drums and tell the world how against this country you really are.

My father served the country in Vietnam and as a result he is now a Disabled American Veteran. When he returned he was not given a hero's welcome because so many people were against the war. The War on Terror is a much more noble cause than Vietnam and it is an outright disgrace to America that it could be protested. Those who protest this war obviously do not have friends or family that were murdered on Sept. 11. They obviously do not have family or friends who are willing to give their life to our nation, and they themselves have no plans on serving this country.

If we do go to war, I would like to voice my appreciation to the men and women who are willing to sacrifice everything to defend our freedom and way of life. I hope our soldiers realize that the ones who are against the military action are but a small minority and have no significant impact on the thoughts that most normal Americans have. Thank you for defending our freedom and way of life against terror.

A self-defeating war

"War is an instrument entirely inefficient toward redressing wrong, and multiplies, instead of indemnifying losses." – Thomas Jefferson

As war with Iraq becomes more and more inevitable, we must all take a moment to reflect on the words of Thomas Jefferson. And as President Bush and the rest of the self-interested politicians that run our country get ready to throw us into a self-defeating war against "evildoers," it is important to take a break from the brain-washing media and think for ourselves about what is really going on here. Anyone with a fair amount of common sense can see that bullying and waging war with Iraq will almost certainly add to the Isolation and hatred of the United States by other nations of the world. It will obviously do nothing to improve the sentiment felt by these countries towards America, which, If you haven't figured it out yet, clearly paves the road to even more terrorism.

Bush knows that if he waits it out, the American people may realize the stupidity of his war against "evildoers." And so, rather than losing the backing of the currently brainwashed public, he must, of course, rush us into his war on terror. The fact is that rather than resolving the issue along with the UN, and attempting to find a peaceful solution, Bush has kept America isolated, silently hoping that the peaceful attempts of the UN will fail, so that he may justify his reasons for war. If you have loved ones in the military as I do, however, it is difficult to swallow the fact that they could be lost in a meaningless, hopeless, self-defeating and self-interested war on "terror."

What President Bush needs, I think, is a history lesson. Not only a lesson on the values that our country is supposed to possess, but a lesson on the consequences of war. Thousands of young Americans lost their lives in Vietnam, and to what avail? Surely It is possible to defeat Iraq, but at what cost? Once again I think it is clear what that cost will be. Many Americans will likely lose their lives, and future generations of Americans will surely suffer the same consequences of terrorism and hatred of our country that we all face today. Attacking the symptoms of the problem are easy. War is easy. Finding the root of the problem is difficult, as is peace, and as long as we allow self-interested politicians and presidents to have the kind of unlimited power that President Bush is likely to be given to wage war on Iraq, and as long as we fail to think for ourselves, there can never be peace.

SIMPSONS

From detentions to D'oh!

By Jessica Pelletier
COLLEGIAN STAFF

For more than a decade, we as an audience have been given an inside view into the dysfunctional lives of the greatest animated family ever. Yes, that's right. Before the Osbournes graced the airwaves with their British - accented profanity, the Simpsons were captured by Fox and have never ceased to disappoint.

From their humble beginnings on the "Tracy Ullman Show", the Simpson family has gone through a variety of changes over the years, not all of these being physical. Granted the quality of the animation has skyrocketed over the past decade or so; hair color of the various secondary characters has remained constant, and uniformity of character design no longer leave us wondering why Moe's locks have changed from black to a lighter shade of purple or why Bart sometimes has warped physical features.

Personalities have developed as well. Focus has shifted from Bart and his practical jokes to Homer and his harebrained schemes and choplogic. Lisa presents the antithesis to Homer's idiocy, and thus has become a second favorite among many viewers. Marge and Maggie, however, remain at the bottom of many people's lists. Although they have had their moments to shine – Maggie's most notable being the infamous "Who Shot Mr. Burns" episode – there just aren't enough entertaining plots focused around a housewife or a character that can't talk. Marge's main actions involve bringing sense to both her husband and the people of Springfield when their decisions seem less than logical. Unlike most series, thankfully, the characters have never been dropped mysteriously from the plotline.

Consistencies such as these are one small part of why the Simpson's fan base has been so loyal over the years. No one character goes without his or her story. Any deaths that occur usually involve an episode which revolves around the character's passing, a la Maude Flanders's unfortunate accident with a t-shirt gun in a football stadium. More importantly, these characters do not reemerge in the next episode as if nothing has transpired.

Celebrity voices have run the gambit from late night talk show host and former episode writer Conan O'Brien to 70s rock band The Ramones.

The imitation of these voices has long been a part of the show as well. For example, neither the Bush family nor Arnold Schwarzenegger ever recorded their voices for any episodes to date (but who knows what the future could hold... hmmm).

The very humor of the program has been altered over the years; bodily humor and prank phone calls have given way to comments on our own social conditions. For example, the opening of a new mall in the Springfield area causes incredible panic among the townspeople and eventually ends with the discovery of the town's "angel" as nothing more than a marketing scam. It is, at this time, ruled "science and religion must stay five hundred feet away from each other at all times." Comments such as these provide a humorous look at the way our own systems of beliefs have

A cartoon's best friend...

Behind every great animated character is a great pet: Charlie Brown had Snoopy, Davie had Goliath and Harry Potter has Hedwig. The Simpsons are no different when it comes to their animal pals. From the usual dog and cat combo to elephants and lobsters, the Simpsons have had a variable menagerie around their household. Let's review, shall we?

Santa's little helper – This feisty greyhound was adopted into the family after his abandonment at the racetrack by his former owner. His losing spirit and helpless-ness caused Homer to understand that his pathetic demeanor wouldn't fit anywhere but in their home.

Snowball I and Snowball II – The Simpson cats are used as visual humor more than anything. The first Snowball had been tragically killed and replaced by another cat of the same name, so not much changed. One of the funniest cameos of this feline occurs when he playfully bats at Lisa's massive ball of twine in the attic and is immediately crushed by its bulk.

(Please don't anyone "snowball" the Collegian with mail due to this comment, I really do love animals and it was a funny moment.)

Stampy – So Bart gets an elephant. Don't question how impossible the situation is, just appreciate its humor. The pachyderm proceeds to wreck havoc on the town arboretum and turn Homer into a human lollipop, eventually leading to his release into a preserve to be with those of his own kind (sniffle, sniffle – single tear).

Pinchy – Dear lord I love this animal. In an attempt to fatten and eat his own free-range lobster, Homer forms a deep attachment with his meal and finds he can no longer bear the thought of eating him...until a tragic accident rips the two apart forever.

Mojo – Homer manages to get a hold of a monkey to help him do menial tasks. Yep, like the kind they give to people with disabilities. Needless to say, neglect sets in and Homer gives up caring for the simian and leads to his eventual return to a pet shop.

Princess and Duncan – Even livestock animals were owned by the lower, middle class Simpsons at one time. These two horses were loved by Bart and Lisa, but eventual financial hardships caused

An ageless beauty keeps a classic alive

Food for thought: the Simpsons arguably have more staying power than other sitcom families on air these days simply because they are an animated series and not a live-action show.

The result? Obvious, but worth mentioning: The Simpson children never grow up. As such, they never need to go off to college, and the show never has to introduce a new cute little kid to make up for the loss. The result is Bart can stay a rambunctious fourth grader forever. Lisa has been in second grade for 13 years, and Maggie is still a baby. The show never really addresses the fact though that the children have had about a dozen Christmases and Halloweens over the years, even though they stay the same age.

In other shows, the cute kids eventually all grow out of their cuteness, forcing the show to evolve from what it originally was meant to be. This is rarely successful. Look at the example of "Happy Days," where teenager Richie Cunningham eventually became a balding adult who went off and joined the military, forcing the series to become the Fonzie show. "The Cosby Show" originally had cute little Rudy, who over the years became teen Rudy, making way for the show's producers to bring in cute little Olivia. "Family Matters" dorky kid Steve Urkel became way too big for those tight jeans, and it just got creepy; he went from nerd to freak.

But perhaps the best point in case is "Saved by the Bell," in which the writer's inevitably replaced the whole cast when the original preteens outgrew their roles. The Simpson's, thanks to the magic of animation and an always full pool of imaginative writers who never have to face real life limitations when directing the show, remains one of the only sitcom families who will never have to deal with these problems.

Retail marketing: Simpson-mania

By Jennifer Eastwood
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Scuffling feet wandering about a store. Eyes focusing from one packed shelf to another. Chiming bells on old-time cash register. Bags filled with playful knick-knacks that delight the senses.

It's merchandising in all its glory. And the Simpson's are surely part of it, having a market out there acquiring enough wealth to even put C. Montgomery Burns to shame.

Merchandising for the Simpson's began small during its initial airing on television. Bart Simpson dolls modestly lined toy store shelves. The ever-popular Pez dispensers sporting the heads of the well recognized family of five dazzled candy counters. Bart's stardom traveled tales, as children of all ages across the nation became familiar with his early catchphrases, ranging from "Eat my shorts" to "Ay carumba."

But slowly, as the show progressed, its script and humorous antics expanding beyond its early roots and bringing focus closer to Homer and other supporting characters like Krusty the Clown and Ralph Wiggum, so swelled its realm of retailing. This shifting focus both on television and in the stores kept its material from getting as outdated as a Kwik-E-Mart hot dog. T-shirts, posters and even collectable figurines began to flood stores across the nation. The trend was set. A coffee mug with the Homer's mug printed on it soon became more than a mere holder for beverages and instead a prized collector's commodity.

Eventually the Simpsons worked their way into enough hearts and minds of enough to embed themselves as a permanent aspect of American popular culture. Accordingly, merchandising once again shifted focus to compensate.

Former Dinosaur Jr. frontman roars on latest studio album

J. MASCIS + THE FOG
Free So Free
Artemis Records

J. Mascis has always thought with his fingers.

As the drummer with Deep Wound, frontman for the influential Dinosaur Jr. and solo artist backed by the revolving Fog, Mascis has held close to that which he considers dear: loud guitars, chugging rhythms and solos that defy reason in their ability to express both pain and hopeful possibility. On Free So Free, Mascis returns to his touchstones by changing the routes he's taken to reach them in the past. The journey reveals that, as a musician and writer, he continues to evolve one measure ahead of the world around him.

"On tour it's tough to write songs just cause I'm so busy and have little privacy," says Mascis, in an interview conducted via email. "It requires a certain desolation and headspace that touring does not offer me. It's harder to be depressed if you're busy."

If the truth is in the chords, then Mascis is the most honest man in the business. The 10 songs on Free So Free are among the most focused he's ever committed to tape; the insistent beats and glorious guitars (including a '58 Telecaster, '62 Jazzmaster and Gibson 330, for those keeping score at home) on this set are colored by gentle sensibilities that should send those rowdy young "The" bands running back to school.

The title track is powered by an inner momentum that causes it to rise and fall like a kite, lifting in one direction above his appropriately drowsy vocals and dragged fiercely back in the other with his guitar. What results is a genuine rhythm and blues excursion that Mascis says had specific reference points in mind.

"That song was inspired a lot by Cat Power," he says. "Somehow trying to catch the vibe of her music which I was listening to at the time."

It worked. The song designed to pull from an equally regarded peer stands tall among the other cuts: many of which echo the different faces of Mascis we've stolen glimpses of before. "If That's How It's Gotta Be" and "Someone Said" capture him lyrically and musically as his most contemplative. These reflections are countered by headstrong, forward steps elsewhere: "Freedom" and "Tell The Truth" underline the point with a pleasantly distorted matter-of-factness. Split the difference and, somewhere in that middle, you'll find the portrait of an artist attending to his lifelong love, the craft of song writing which the passage of time has allowed him to mold into a more personal and fulfilling shape.

"It's changed in the way that I record at home now, which is a lot different than recording at a studio," says Mascis. "It's more relaxed. But on the other side, [it] usually ends up taking more time. The only significant difference I notice since Dino is that I don't feel constricted by what I think Murph could play or not on the drums, so that makes a few different styles and grooves available to me."

He explores those grooves and feels out older, more comfortable ones as well. His knack for writing new songs that you've seemingly enjoyed time and again before is unmatched, as is his penchant for digging up different ways to explore alienation, love and loss in his words.

Free So Free is in many ways something we've already heard; however, when the storyteller is this damn good, the tales only get better with each additional helping.

Mascis will bring the new material to the Iron Horse in Northampton tonight at 8 p.m., performing a solo, acoustic set as part of his multi-city tour.

There's nothing elementary about poetry at ABC open mic night

By Cameron J. Woods
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

All night long during the New World Theater's Word for Word, an open mic poetry night at the Amherst Brewing Company on Tuesday, D.J. crew Kosher Kuts spun a mix of R&B, Rap, Soul and alternative music.

The audience filling the room and spilling over into ABC's bar area was diverse. Attendants ranged from middle-aged people in formal dress to college students with neon hair. There were even entire families that showed up together for the show. The one thing that drew this great diversity of people together was the promise of a night jammed with wordsmiths sharing their work.

"We put this project together in order to start a connection building with the Amherst community," NWT coordinator Uday Joshey, who started the open mic series last year at the University of Massachusetts, said before the show. "We are building bridges between the Universities, the town and our theater group."

Though the atmosphere was reminiscent of the stereotypical, dimly lit, smoky meetings of the Beatniks of yesteryear, the show proved to be anything but. "I hope that we will hear voices from one end to the other," said hostess Mildred Ruiz before the night began.

Hosts Steven Sapp and Mildred Ruiz of the theater group Universes took the stage around 9:30 p.m. and announced that each performer was limited to one poem, song or verse; this was disregarded after the sixth set. They also opened the night with short performances of their own. Sapp's lively and spirited poem set the tone for the night for the other poets, who "step into the underground university and unlearn to learn."

Ruiz shifted away from strict poetry and split the thick air of the ABC with a Soul/Blues song about the woes of being a woman.

Each of the two-dozen artists performed with a unique style and theme. Subjects ran from equal rights and oppression to denouncing the government and breaking away from old ties. Performer Chris Reed brought a comedic note to the evening by altering the use of the often-shouted "Holla" to "Holler" in order to better suit the Amherst audience.

After a particularly sobering and sad poem about apathy, Steven Sapp tried to rouse the crowd up a bit. "Come on people I know you got some flava in Amherst, even if it is... Grandaa." After everyone settled a bit, Sapp introduced Dawn Martinez.

Martinez took a very different approach from the early performers, as she spoke in a soft tone that was clear and measured. She did not once curse or scream, as everyone else had done at least once per set. Her lack of volume proved not to impede her words, because her voice acted like an electric silk knife causing the crowd to fall into a reverent silence as she sang.

The night was brought to a close by a set featuring Lucky Dice, a UMass student who set down a rhyme about being pushed to the limit by expectations – something many college students can probably relate to. Steven Sapp's two-year-old son strolled onto the stage and quickly turned Dice's solo set into a duet.

Ruiz came on stage and showed her thanks to the crowd by singing a final song entirely in Spanish.

When asked after the show if he still though Amherst's "flava" was granola, Sapp smiled broadly and replied, "Hell nahh!"

If you missed the show, there will be other open mic nights held on Nov. 19 and on Dec. 10. The November show will be held at Atticus Books in Amherst at 8 p.m. It will be a youth oriented event.

MICROLOGY

Dedicated to the subtle science of microwave cookery in all its forms and varients

WITH JESSICA PELLETIER

In every college person's life, there comes a time when munchies are in order, regardless of whether boredom, stress or smoking illegal substances cause them. So for those light eaters out there, barrages of quick recipes have been compiled to accommodate your need to nosh. Some of these are no-brainers, but maybe it'll give you something else to go with over the party-size bag of Doritos you've got your eye on.

The first of these recipes is a staple around my house during the holiday season. It's a cheddar-based crab dip, which goes best on English muffins or slices of toasted French bread. Begin by melting a third of a cup of butter – no cheating. If you're going to eat something fattening, don't ruin it with margarine – and adding two teaspoons of Tabasco sauce with one tablespoon Worcestershire sauce into a microwave safe dish. Drain the water from one can of lump crab meat and add to the butter. Nothing thrills me more greatly than hot crustacean swimming in a lacuzzi of creamy lipids, but this dish gets one step better once you add the Old English cheddar spread and zap the dish on high for fifteen minutes, stirring occasionally until melted.

If, by some stroke of luck, you've managed to sneak a toaster oven into your room or you have the good fortune to live off-campus, this dip is infinitely better when broiled until golden brown on a toasted English muffin. And you can thank my aunt Cheryl for this one, cause she's the one who found the recipe.

Next we have the crispy cereal treat. This probably seems kind of stupid, considering that if you honestly wanted this sweet concoction, you'd run to the store and buy a box. Whatever. Humor me. I've got lines to fill, and you've got time to kill; it works for us both. Melt a half a cup of butter in the baking dish you plan on pressing the cereal into, and add 40 large marshmallows to the pan as well. The process up to this point will take about five minutes, so amuse yourself with the humorous antics of the dust bunnies collecting on the homework you should be doing. When the agonizing five minutes are up, press five cups of whatever cereal of your choice into the pan and let it chill for a few... unless you prefer your crispy treats warm, crunchly and dripping with melted butter.

(Melted chocolate chips and chopped peanuts make these bars perfect for a night when you need a salty/sweet combo without dipping fries into your milkshake.)

Finally, the only thing I could come up with was a recipe for stuffed mushroom caps. Pull out the stem of the 'shroom with the fury of 1000 scorned women and place the caps in your dish (you should end up with about a dozen or so caps. Melt another half a cup of butter – yes we're trying to fill your arteries with this stuff – and add a cup of breadcrumbs with two tablespoons chopped green onion. The butter used in the stuffing should seep into the mushrooms and soften them without causing a soggy mess.

I'm outta hints for this week folks. Enjoy the long weekend and score some delicious eats with your friends in the meantime, cause I know I will. Next week, comfort foods: out with the stove, in with the spinning wonder of a microwave carousel. From meatloaf to noodle soup, we're giving it to you hot and fresh, cause we know that's how you like it.

No longer did items just feature the hit television series. Instead, the show's references linked to other forms of with American pop culture.

Think of the Simpson's versions of the hit board games Monopoly and Clue. Think of video games featuring the crazy cast. Think of the now-produced Simpson's poster staging the family to resemble the cast of characters from HBO's acclaimed series, "The Sopranos."

The trend over time, however, has been less cost efficient and more extravagant. With the recent releases of the series' first two seasons on DVD now one, clad in pair of boxer shorts featuring Homer and his full mug Duff Beer, could sit at home for hours on end of Simpson's amusements.

In such a consumer driven society, merchandising seems too often to consume all thought and money. But look at it this way: it's still probably safer than eating some sugar frosted Krusty-O's.

"The Simpsons" often have celebrity characters on their show. In February of 1997, David Hyde Pierce and Kelsey Grammer starred in such an episode.

the first of these ponies to be sold. As for Duncan, who knows why he disappeared, but he never appeared again.

Laddie – In a fit of credit card fraud, Bart purchases a collie, which performs a variety of humanesque tasks, most notably the ability to be toilet trained. Jealousy envelopes the other two resident pets, to the point where they develop the ability to walk upright and speak for a shred of attention.

And as the seasons wear on, I'm sure dozens of other furry co-stars will fill the ranks.

Worry not fellow fans of this generation's Flintstone family, the fourteenth, fifteenth and sixteenth seasons have already been signed into production. 1987 all over again

MATT SHERMAN

If you are a child of the '80s and became a baseball enthusiast in the middle of that decade as I did, then the teams participating in the 2002 League Championship Series might just bring you back to those days.

At this time fifteen years ago, the baseball world was focused on Minnesota, St. Louis, San Francisco, and Detroit. Today, aside from those Detroit Tigers, who have fallen off the radar, the Minnesota Twins, St. Louis Cardinals, and San Francisco Giants grab the attention of baseball fans much like they did back in 1987 as they now play for the right to go to the World Series.

And we cannot forget about the other team that is playing, the Anaheim Angels, fresh off their thumping of the eternal American League champion Yankees. The then-California Angels made their last ALCS appearance just a year before the three other teams mentioned, in 1986. Now as I think about the Twins, Angels, Cardinals, and Giants playing in the LCS this year, I realize the 2002 versions of these clubs have many striking differences from their forefathers of the mid-80s, yet at the same time many striking similarities.

Let us start with the Minnesota Twins. This year's team is a scrappy, young, possibly even overachieving bunch that played hard all year and cruised to an easy division title in a painfully weak AL Central division. They lack any widely recognized superstars with the possible exception of Torii Hunter. They did win 94 games, but that was the lowest win total of any of the eight playoff teams. The 1987 Twins also had the lowest win total of the playoff teams (then just four, of course), with 85.

But the similarities end right there. That was a veteran team with many household names and quite a bit of pop in the lineup. While the current Twins do not boast a single player who hit over 30 homeruns during the regular season, the 1987 team had three (Gary Gaetti, Kent Hrbek, and Tom Brunansky), while Kirby Puckett hit .28. Granted, Wade Boggs of all people hit 24 homeruns that year (there were rumors that the ball was "juiced"), but the Twins did finish second in the AL in homeruns. Their pitching staff was led by the ancient Bert Blyleven and 27-year old Frank Viola, who won 15 and 17 games respectively. Rick Reed (15 wins) and Eric Milton (13 wins) probably most closely resemble those two, although their names don't quite carry the same prestige. While the 2002 Twins won nine more games than the '87 bunch, it was the '87 group that was more established and recognized.

The present Angels differ a bit from the '86 team, but there are a good amount of similarities as well. The Angels surprised people this year, coming from out of nowhere to streak to the wildcard in the AL. The Angels winning the AL West in 1986 did not come as a surprise to most as they finished just a game out of first place in 1985 and won 92 games. They won 92 again in '86, and won the division fairly easily. The Angels lineup was quite elderly, sporting 40-year old Reggie Jackson, Bob Boone (38), Doug DeCinces and Brian Downing (both 35).

This year's team, with the exception of Tim Salmon (34), consists of many a spring chicken. The similarities probably outweigh the differences in this case though. The Angels offense struck out the least of any team in baseball this year and in '86 only two other teams in baseball struck out less than they did. This year's team had three players with 30 or more homeruns (Troy Glaus, Tim Salmon, and Garrett Anderson), and the same rang true in '86 for Brian Downing, Doug DeCinces, and rookie Wally Joyner. Both the '86 and '02 Angels also had veteran pitching, although the two main exceptions for the earlier club were Mike Witt and Kirk McCaskill, who were both 25 and had outstanding seasons. But Witt and McCaskill's youth was balanced out by 41-year old Don Sutton, whom I'm convinced was born with gray hair. Rookie Chuck Finley pitched out of the pen in 1986. Now pitching for St. Louis, he may face his original team in the World Series. We'll have to wait and see.

Switching over to the National League, first we'll look at this year's NL Central Division champs, the St. Louis Cardinals. The '02 Cards, who finished at 97-65, fended off the Reds and Astros for much of the season until an amazing September pushed them way ahead to a comfortable finish. The '87 Red Birds had nearly the same record at 95-67, but in winning the NL East had to hold off the defending world champion Mets, who won 92 games. The Expos finished third winning 91 contests (boy, times have changed!).

But the Cardinals of today are not the Cardinals of your Kindergarten days. Busch Stadium, which has been the home of arguably the most dedicated and loving fans in all of sports for many years, went through a dramatic change in 1992 when the centerfield fence was moved from 414 feet away from home to 402 feet. This change in distance is one reason why the '87 club had almost no big homerun hitters and this year's Cardinals have a handful of guys who can go deep. Jack Clark was the only power hitter to speak of on the '87 team, hitting 35. No one else had more than 12.

The '02 team has eight players who had double figure homerun totals. It's still not the easiest place in the league to hit a homerun (unless you are Mark McGwire), but things have certainly changed. The pitching staffs are comparable: the '87 Cards had veterans like John Tudor and Bob Forsch, with two younger pitchers, Danny Cox and Greg Mathews, who were also a big part of the rotation. This year's team: veteran Woody Williams and Chuck Finley plus youngsters Matt Morris and Jason Simontacchi. But overall, the team of yesteryear had a different feel. Lacking power, they relied on scrappy, speedy, fundamental baseball and players like Ozzie Smith, Willie McGee, Tom Herr, Tony Pena, and Terry Pendleton fit the bill. The '02 team has hulks like Jim Edmonds, Albert Pujols, Tino Martinez, and Scott Rolen. However, little Fernando Vina is definitely a guy that would have fit in nicely with the '87 team. I would be foolish if I didn't mention that the '02 Cardinals are playing for something much bigger than a championship trophy. With the losses of Jack Buck, and especially teammate Darryl Kile, this run for the title is much more emotionally fueled than any other in baseball history.

Finally there are the San Francisco Giants. This year's Giants did not even know if they were going to the playoffs until the final week of the season when they clinched the wildcard, while the '87 team won the NL West by six games without too much trouble. The '87 Giants were that season's equivalent to the current Twins, losing 100 games just two years earlier and lacking big names. Playing in his second year, Will Clark made a name for himself by hitting 35 homeruns and batting .308. A much skinnier Kevin Mitchell played for that team, hitting 15 homeruns, but he was far from stardom at that point. Obviously Barry Bonds was not there yet, as he was finding his stroke with the pitiful Pirates and actually struck out much more than he walked, if you can believe that. They also did not have a left Kenn, Kenny Lofton, Rich Aurilia, or a Benito Santiago, players who have been around and gone through the playoff wars. Both teams carried a number of older pitchers, but neither had one starter who really struck fear into the opposition. Mike Krukow came off a 20-win season in '86, but followed than up with just five victories in '87. Like the Twins, some how some way, the '87 Giants managed to win their division without high profile superstars. Also in an ironic note, Tim Worrell, who had a terrific season out of the bullpen this year for the Giants, was a 19-year old kid watching his older brother Todd save games for the Cardinals in '87.

Certainly what happened in the 1987 postseason has no bearing on what will happen in 2002, but for those who don't remember, the Twins defeated the Cardinals in seven games in an exciting World Series.

There is no way to predict whether history will repeat itself or not, but one thing is for sure: unlike in 1987, I will not be sent to bed before these games are over.

DAILY COLLEGIAN FILE/1998

Debuting at Saturday's football game, MinuteFAN Park will have a carnival atmosphere directed at the young UMass fans and students. Face painting, hot air balloon rides, a reggae band and skill games are some highlights of the event.

Black Bears.

"We're expecting a crowd of somewhere around 13,000 for Homecoming so it should be a great atmosphere," McCaw said. "A lot of alumni and friends are coming back and even though it's a long weekend we think the students will turn out in really good numbers as well."

MinuteFAN Park is free for all ticket holders, and will be located on the Dallas Mall outside of McGuirk Alumni Stadium. The Homecoming Park, sponsored by the Alumni Association, will also be located within MinuteFAN Park, which will open at 10 a.m. on Saturday.

With the Minutemen being in Div. I-AA football, revenue can be tough to come by, as McGuirk only holds 17,000 fans, many of which are students, whose admission is covered in activities fees. Also, the I-AA atmosphere is a far cry from that which the Maroon and White witnessed in its voyage to Raleigh, N.C. for a contest against ACC program North Carolina State. There, McCaw and the athletic staff saw 51,000 fans fill Carter-Finley Stadium and the parking lot surrounding it for a day's worth of football, starting with tailgating before the game, and ending with a few beers following the contest.

"What [MinuteFAN Park] does is it gives you something to do around the game," McCaw said. "College football, at most places around the country, is a day-long event. It isn't just 1:00 to 4:00 in the afternoon – there's something to do before the game and something to do after. This gives our fans a great entertainment opportunity before the game to come early and socialize, meet people, enjoy some different entertainment, food and beverage, music and so forth."

Getting the community to come out to the games is something that is quite a challenge for the Athletic Department, but MinuteFAN Park is the first step in increasing community involvement with UMass Athletics. But in order to make the atmosphere more like that of Div. I-A football, the student section needs to be filled up and in unison, as those who attended saw at N.C. State, where thousands of students, all decked out in red, poured into a couple of sections of Carter-Finley Stadium.

"I'd like to challenge all the students to come out and support their team," McCaw said. "This is their football team, we're playing the No. 2 team in Division I-AA and this is as big a game as we've had around here in a long time. We need everybody in the stadium, making a lot of noise and rallying the troops."

The offensive line will have its hands full at Warren P. McGuirk Alumni Stadium, however, because Maine boasts the 2001 Atlantic 10 Defensive Player of the Year, Stephen Cooper, who Whipple heaps praise upon.

"They have the best linebacker in the league and the best player in the league in Cooper," Whipple said.

But it is the Black Bears' offensive struggles that are getting all the press and on Saturday, one may think that the UMass defense, coming off a strong performance down south, would be able to contain the Maine attack easily.

Not so fast, according to Whipple, who doesn't think that Maine's offense is as much a question mark as James Madison's defense is tough to move on.

"James Madison did a great job on third downs," Whipple said. "They always play well at home."

Don't expect the Black Bear offense to change much, as Whipple is quick to point out.

"Maine wants to run the ball," the Brown alum said. "There's no secret there. James Madison did a great job stopping them. It comes down to the same thing [for UMass]."

If the Minutemen can stop the running game, Maine will be unable to utilize the play action pass, which quarterback Jake Eaton has turned into an art form.

"He's playing at a high level," Whipple said of Eaton, who he calls one of the smartest football players in the league. "He understands the game."

With Maine's offense now considered a question mark and UMass' growing confidence after a road win against a tough A-10 opponent, a victory for either team would likely propel it into a successful remainder of the A-10 schedule.

A dominating Black Bears win with a strong offensive performance would cement the team as one of the absolute best teams in I-AA and silence all doubters. A Minuteman win, however, would catapult the team into the top of the conference and warm all of I-AA that it is back in the hunt for a National Championship.

Angels even ALCS in Metrodome, 1-1

By Ronald Blum
ASSOCIATED PRESS

MINNEAPOLIS (AP) – So much for Minnesota's Metrodome dominance.

Darin Erstad and Brad Fullmer bonered off Rick Reed as Anaheim built a six-run lead, and the high-flying Angels beat the perky, pesky Twins 6-3 Wednesday night to head home with a split in the first two games of the AL championship series.

Anaheim	6
Minnesota	3

A night after Joe Mays stymied Anaheim's high-octane offense in the Twins' 2-1 opening victory, the Angels got to Reed from the start. Erstad, the No. 2 batter, sent Reed's sixth pitch over the fence in right-center, where it landed 409 feet away – nestled in a stacked-up seat used for football games.

Anaheim tacked on three more runs in the second, two of them unearned because of a costly error by catcher A.J. Pierzynski who couldn't hold on to a throw home after Reed caught a runner off first.

When Fullmer chased Reed with a two-run homer in the sixth, it seemed over. But Minnesota battled right back, knocking Ramon Ortiz out in the sixth when Corey Koskie hit an RBI single and Doug Mientkiewicz, who had three hits, had a two-run single.

Brendan Donnelly replaced Ortiz and got out of the inning, and 20-year-old rookie Francisco Rodriguez struck out two in a 1-2-3 seventh.

After a two-out walk to Torii Hunter and a single by Mientkiewicz put runners at the corners in the eighth, Angels manager Mike Scioscia brought in Troy Percival, whom he had been reluctant to use in the eighth until after the New York Yankees rallied to win the division series opener.

Percival, who hasn't allowed an unearned run to Minnesota in 35 innings during the regular season, got ahead 1-2 in the count on pinch-hitter Bobby Kielty. With the crowd on its feet, shouting and waving Hankies, Kielty took a called third strike over the inside corner. Percival finished up with a perfect ninth for the save.

When the series resumes Friday in California, Jarrod Washburn pitches for the Anaheim against Eric Milton, who no-hit the Angels in September 1999.

With Tuesday's win, Minnesota improved its post-season record at the Metrodome, where grounders to shortstop can turn into doubles, to 13-2. Reed has two of the Twins' three postseason losses in the dome.

Anaheim found the solution: Get a big early lead to quiet those Homer Hanky-waving fans.

A Metrodome baseball record 55,990 filled the ballpark, and they didn't like what they saw early. Erstad, 5-for-12 against Reed in his career, put the Angels ahead in the first with his first postseason homer.

Bonds leads Giants to Game One victory

By Ben Walker
ASSOCIATED PRESS

ST. LOUIS (AP) – Barry Bonds was smack in the middle of everything: driving in runs, scoring them and even flashing his temper in the NL championship opener.

Bonds delivered yet another big hit, lining a key triple and later getting embroiled in a skirmish that nearly turned into a real slugfest as the San Francisco Giants beat the St. Louis Cardinals 9-6 Wednesday night.

San Francisco	9
St. Louis	6

In a postseason that is rapidly becoming all his own, Bonds went 1-for-2 with three walks. The four-time MVP, known in the past for his playoff failures, hit three home runs against Atlanta in the opening round.

Benito Santiago, batting behind Bonds, homered and drove in four runs, and Kenny Lofton and David Bell also connected. It was 6-1 after three innings as the Giants tattooed Matt Morris, and it was a good omen for the – the team that has won the last nine NLCS openers has gone on to reach the World Series.

It was the way Lofton admired his shot, however, that led to a high-and-tight pitch the next time around, emptying both benches and bullpens.

Lofton had to be restrained by several teammates, a coach and an umpire after spinning away from reliever Mike Crudale's fastball in the fifth inning.

As players sprinted toward the plate, Bonds and Cardinals reserve Eduardo Perez had to be separated, with Cardinals reliever Steve Kline pacifying the Giants slugger.

Managers Tony La Russa and Dusty Baker, who a day earlier gushed about how much they liked each other, started screaming in a heated exchange that forced a pair of umpires to pull them apart.

About the only one to keep cool as Kirk Rueter. Born and raised right across the Mississippi River, he kept winning at the ballpark where he rooted for the Cardinals as a kid.

The big lead enabled the Giants to hold off a rally fueled by home runs from Albert Pujols, surprising Miguel Cairo and pinch-hitter J.D. Drew. Robb Nen pitched the ninth for a save.

Game 2 is Thursday night with Woody Williams, who hasn't pitched since Sept. 20 because of a pulled muscle in his left side, starting for St. Louis against Jason Schmidt.

Busch Stadium, full of red and ready to erupt from the start, quickly grew silent as Lofton led off the game with a walk and, after an intentional walk to Bonds, scored on Santiago's two-out infield hit.

Atlantic 10-leading Maine on tap for UM

By Jim Pignatiello
COLLEGIAN STAFF

There have been many surprises in Atlantic 10 football this season.

Northeastern and James Madison are much better than expected. The teams were ranked 10th and 11th, respectively, in the A-10 Preseason Poll and are currently a combined 7-4 overall (4-3 A-10).

The Maine Black Bears, however, are not one of these surprises. Chosen to finish No. 2 in the A-10 and beginning the year ranked No. 15 in Division I-AA, Maine has played solid ball both at home and on the road in 2002. Now ranked No. 2 in the nation, Maine stands at 6-0 (4-0 A-10).

The Black Bears began the A-10 season in Week Two with a big 27-14 win over William & Mary, which was selected No. 1 in the A-10 Preseason Poll. Maine followed that up with a 21-14 win at No. 6 Villanova. After two easy wins over Howard (42-12) and Rhode Island (51-14), the Black Bears barely came out of James Madison last week with a 17-6 victory. After the Dukes limited Maine to just nine first downs and 76 rushing yards, the Black Bear offense has to be considered a question mark for a team with hopes of winning a national championship.

Saturday, Maine will face one of its toughest opponents to date, the Massachusetts football team (3-2, 1-1 A-10). UMass is coming off its most important win of the season, a 34-13 thumbing of Richmond at University of Richmond Stadium.

The Minutemen forced five turnovers in the contest and rushed for 268 yards against a normally tough Spider defense. Marvon and White running back Raunny Rosario led the way with 132 yards on 17 carries. R.J. Cobbs contributed 115 yards on 17 carries.

UMass Head Coach Mark Whipple saw his offensive line take a step in the right direction in Richmond, as represented by the strong running game.

"There's no question that there was improvement [on the offensive line at Richmond]," Whipple said.

MinuteFAN Park opens as McCaw's first move

By Matt Brady
COLLEGIAN STAFF

When new Athletic Director Ian McCaw arrived on the University of Massachusetts campus, he promised changes. The University's budget crunch put him behind the eight-ball in terms of having revenue to support a large athletic program. He needed to find a way to raise money and to get fans to see UMass' student-athletes compete.

This weekend marks the first step in that journey.

"MinuteFAN Park is going to make its debut on Saturday," McCaw said. "It's going to be a really exciting carnival-like atmosphere for our fans and students. There's going to be a kids zone where there's going to be face painting, balloons and clowns, those types of things. In the other areas there's going to be live music, we're going to have a reggae band, there are going to be hot air balloon rides, there will be skill contests.

"There's just going to be a lot of different entertainment options for people and it's going to create an exciting atmosphere for our game," he continued. "We've had a lot of good feedback about it so far – I think people are excited about it."

And what a weekend for the park's debut. The first home contest in a month. Homecoming. An intense battle between a pair of conference favorites. The second-ranked team in Division I-AA coming into town is the Maine

Minutewomen drop to 0-12

Heather Kenney and the field hockey team were outshot 12-1 in the first half of Wednesday's loss at PC.

By Todd Foster
COLLEGIAN STAFF

One of the hardest games to focus on is the match right before the start of your conference schedule. The non-conference opponent can seem almost meaningless when you have the games that "really" matter ahead. The members of the Massachusetts field hockey team knew they had focus for one game before battling with Atlantic 10 opponent, Richmond on Friday at Richard F. Garber Field.

The Minutewomen (0-12) visited the Providence Friars (6-8, Big East) yesterday for an afternoon contest at Hendricken Field. The Maroon and White fell to the Friars, 3-1, but improved upon a lot of areas in the game.

UMass has been getting fewer penalty corners against previous opponents, but dominated in corners against Providence. The Minutewomen took 16 corners in the game, including one for a goal by Sarah Bohonowicz. Providence still held its own in that department with 10 corners.

As in recent weeks, the Maroon and White has been picking up its play in the second half. After falling 3-0 going into the half, UMass shut out Providence and dominated the rest of the half. This was the kind of play Coach Patty Shea expects to see more often in the Atlantic 10 portion of the season.

"We played our best half of hockey in the second half," Shea said. "After falling into a 3-0 hole, it's tough to climb off of that."

The Friars jumped out to an early lead when senior Courtney Dow scored a goal only seven minutes into the game. The goal was assisted by senior Jennifer Chin, who collected the rebound off Lindsey Brooks' shot from the corner. Chin quickly found Dow for the score.

Chin showed off her versatility for Providence's second goal at the 28th minute-mark. Brooks set a cross to Chin, collecting the ball and put it passed goalie Christine Tocco to give the Friars a 2-0 lead. The goal gave Chin her third point, tying her teammate Dow for the game-high.

With less than four minutes until half, Providence took advantage of the late corner attempt as Kara Lukens banged home a corner attempt from Dow, who took the hit out. The last score of the half gave the Friars a comfortable lead going into the half, 3-0.

Tocco recorded five saves and gave up three goals in her 35 minutes of action, before being replaced by Ashley Egland in the second half. Both of these goalies have seen sufficient time this season, though Egland has played the bulk of the minutes.

Both Providence goalies saw time in the game as well. Meaghan Moran, a Framingham, Mass. native, didn't see a single shot in her 58 minutes of action. Her replacement, Meredith Jones, made one save and gave up the only goal scored by UMass.

"In the second half, we outshot them and had more corners," Shea said. "We had 15 corners [out of 16] in the second half. We totally dominated just by doing things like going to the ball, picking the right angles, and attacking. That makes a world of difference."

The Maroon and White's defense shut down the Providence offense, only getting off one shot on Egland. The lone shot gave Egland her only save on the day as the entire defense had a strong second half performance against an offense that produced three goals in the first half.

"Our offense has come along, but it's your defense that creates your offense," Shea said. "[The defense] kept the ball in front of them. We didn't allow them to penetrate us and we kept coming at them."

With three minutes to go, Bohonowicz got the Minutewomen on the board with an unassisted goal. The goal prevented the shut out as the Friars defeated the Maroon and White, 3-1.

Winless through their first 11 games, Shea feels they are still the team to beat until someone knocks them off the top of the mountain, where UMass has been for the past six years. After six straight Atlantic 10 championships, the pressure is on for a seventh straight title.

"We just played our best half of hockey and that will carry over into the Richmond game," said Shea, still very confident. "We are still the team that everybody else has to chase in the conference. Bottom line is we aren't going to let them do it."

"From the blueline in he has no weaknesses. He's physical despite his size and he has the hands, the vision, the shot and the attitude to be lethal."

Hockey East Player Value Rankings

Players are listed as ranked by an expert panel of Collegian hockey analysts, including Matthew F. Sacco, Matt Brady, Matt Desrosiers, Andy Vogt, Jim Pignatiello, Glen Straub, Andy Merritt and Jason Edenhart II.

Rankings are based on three main factors: position, statistics and versatility.

Each player is ranked among Hockey East players within his position, indicated by the number to his left. The players are ranked among their teammates in the order that they are listed. Rookies are indicated with an R and are not ranked. These rankings do not represent the views and opinions of conference coaches, players or officials.

be able to move and carry the puck well. He has to skate. Has to skate, laterally as well as North-South. He has to have a pro-level shot and pro-level instincts. You need him to think the game and anticipate as well as he plays it, physically. And obviously it's an advantage if he's the unselfish, leader-type as well.

"What you're looking for is the total package."

What you're looking for is Ryan Whitney.

"It isn't often that you find a defenseman that can carry a game," the scout says. "But that's what this guy (Whitney) brings to the ice every time out."

In the slanted, modern view of hockey, where forwards who score goals and netminders who stop them are seen as the cornerstones of franchises, it is a rarity to see a blueliner recognized as early in his career as Whitney has been.

That's not to say he doesn't have any competition for Hockey East's top individual perch. Six-foot-3, 200 pounds and versatile, but only a sophomore, Whitney still has a lot of growth and maturation left in him.

Not so for Boston College's Ben Eaves, UNH's Colin Hemingway and Northeastern's Mike Ryan. Strobe light quickness, ice-water veins and a chip on each shoulder helped the veteran trio become premier offensive threats last season.

"He's got great vision and understanding," UMass' Toot Cahoon says of Eaves. "Soft hands, that sixth sense and he is remarkably poised. He just doesn't do a lot of things that get in the way of his importance."

Hemingway had 66 points a year ago, playing primarily on the second line behind graduated Hobey Baker finalist Darren Haydar. The Canadian pivot does not ebb during crunch time. His 10 game-winning goals led the nation last season.

Ryan is shiftier than a waitress working in a diner on Sunday morning. One Western Conference scout says, "He is a threat anytime he crosses into the offensive zone with the puck. Two words: don't blink."

A host of injuries and a preseason number one stigma for Providence forced Nolan Schaefer into the oven, where he thrived.

"The best phrase you can use to describe Nolan Schaefer is ice cold," the scout says. "He just doesn't do a lot to hurt himself."

But in completeness of game, none of these players can sit at Whitney's table.

His National Hockey League Central Scouting Service report is almost verbatim to our scout's description of a franchise cornerstone.

A strong skater…an excellent passer…moves the puck quickly…can carry the puck end to end…reads the play well…has a low, hard and accurate shot from the point.

Keep in mind he's only 19. His 21-point freshman season was simply a flash photo of what he can become.

"We knew that when we recruited him that he would be an impact player for us," Parker said. "He has definitely played as we had expected."

As the fifth overall pick of the Pittsburgh Penguins and arguably Hockey East's best young player, expectations are abound. A captaincy and a place in Terrier lore are likely what he ahead for Whitney, but anything can happen.

And like the mantra of Hockey East's best player, Whitney's future is up for debate.

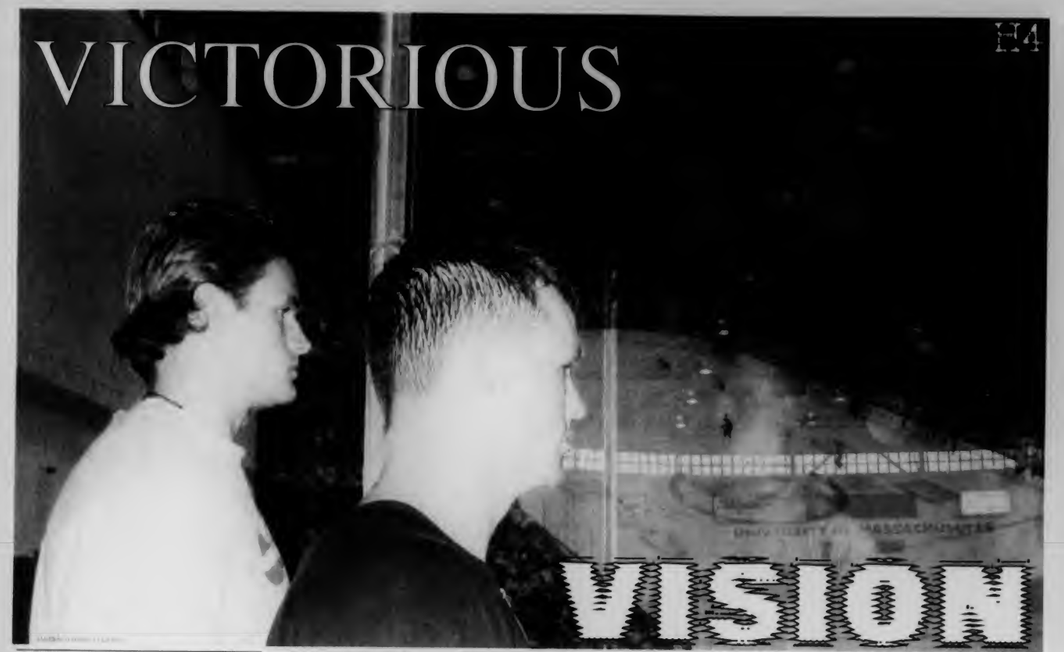
The Hockey East Media Luncheon is about to conclude. Conference commish Joe Bertagna has said his thank yous, wished his lucks and fired his parting thoughts. The predictions and debates can stop now.

The chattering of glassware and the rumble of farewells mark a mass exodus to the elevators.

"There's still time for some last minute interviews," Bertagna declares to the audience of backsides before him.

Dismissing the announcement as immaterial, Boston College coach Jerry York makes for the door. York finishes not two paces before being halted by our infamous reporter with an 11th hour inquiry.



"So who do you think is the best player in Hockey East?" he says.

York responds, "C'mon, you can't ask me that question."

VISION

YOUTH MOVEMENT

By Andy Vogt
Collegian Staff

As Tuesday's practice was winding down, several members of the Massachusetts hockey team were participating in a shooting drill on new netminder Michael Waidlich. As Tim Turner deposited the puck behind the new goaltender, several of his teammates erupted in a vicious celebration as they came together. A squad that suffered through a 8-24-2 record in the 2001-02 year was still finding happiness in the game it loves.

But don't think that the 2002-03 season's going to be just fun and games.

This team means business, and come hell or high water the Minutemen aren't going to allow a repeat of their previous two disappointing seasons in which they failed to qualify for the conference postseason.

"It's essential for us to not only make the playoffs but to win a lot of games this year," said senior Turner, one of the team's co-captains.

Only five Minutemen remain from the squad that just missed out on the Hockey East quarterfinals during the 2000-01 campaign. UMass was in contention for the eighth and final position going into the final evening of play, after pulling out a thrilling overtime win over New Hampshire in Durham the previous night.

But with the Wildcats in town for the back end of the home-and-home, UNH's two-time All-American Ty Conklin shut out the Minutemen 3-0. UMass was unable to pick up the point it needed to overtake Merrimack in the standings, and watched its season end abruptly.

Flash forward to the end of last season. The Minutemen would not again be eliminated on the final evening of Hockey East play. That's because by the time last year's season-ending loss to Merrimack occurred, the Maroon and White had already been out of the running for a playoff berth, as the Warriors again grabbed the final spot.

For the five upperclassmen that remain, similar results will be inexcusable.

"It's embarrassing," Turner (pictured above right) said. "One thing we're going to make sure of is that it's not going to happen again."

"The upperclassmen were here a month early, and we talked about how we have to change things this year," senior co-captain Kelly Sickavish (pictured above left) said. "Losing doesn't get any easier."

You think losing is difficult for the players? For Head Coach Don Cahoon, the setbacks and near misses his team endured were equally as tough to swallow. After all, the former Princeton bench leader didn't come to Amherst because of his aptitude for the loss column. Cahoon led the Tigers out of the doldrums of college hockey into respectability during his nine-year tenure, making the ECAC finals four years after he took over the reins and winning a conference championship in 1998.

So it shouldn't be a surprise that the struggles the Minutemen endured weren't easy on the coach, as evident by a three-word statement uttered following the pair of games last November in which UMass dropped two heartbreaking one-goal contests to UMass-Lowell.

"I hate losing."

Coming up just short was one of the most difficult themes for the Maroon and White to endure last year, as it dropped 10 games by just one score. The lack of scoring all season (just 70 goals in 34 contests) was a major factor in UMass' inability to pull out the close ones.

"One of the problems we had in our one-goal games is we haven't had the scoring punch to get over the edge," Turner said. "We've brought some guys that can hopefully do that for us."

Well, if you're a fan of seeing the light of the goal lamp, then this year's incoming group just might be for you. One of the top recruiting classes in the nation, Cahoon's freshmen may be the "Golden Ticket" to lead the offense out of its anemic ways. Forwards Stephen Werner, Chris Capraro, Matt Anderson, Stephen Jacobs, and the rest of the rookies should all provide the firepower the Minutemen have desperately sought to escape the cellar.

But the 13 newcomers to the Minuteman squad will only be freshmen to the University. When it comes to hockey, each member is an equal piece of the puzzle, a crucial element to the success of any team, but especially important to one struggling to get a monkey off its back.

"Our young kids aren't being looked down upon," Sickavish said. "For a team to win, you've got to be a family."

And this Minuteman family is one of the biggest in New England. 50 brothers strong. But instead of fighting for affection from their parents, these brothers will be fighting for playing time from Father Cahoon. With only 20 roster spots available for each game, quite a few players will be viewing the action from off the ice.

"If you don't skate out there and don't do your job, you're not going to play," junior Thomas Pock said.

"We're giving a lot of kids an opportunity, and the strong will survive," Cahoon added. "But we can't expect them to carry us, just like we couldn't expect last year's freshman class to carry us."

Building a young team is never easy, as Cahoon well knows. Despite all the acclaim he received at Princeton, the success the Tigers achieved didn't just come overnight. And with 25 underclassmen, the Maroon and White can expect to still struggle at times this season. But the continued positive attitude among his charges is refreshing considering the Minutemen could easily get down on themselves.

"I think everyone's apprehensive about how we're going to be," Cahoon said. "But I think they believe in their hearts that this program is taking baby steps in the right direction.

"My first few years at Princeton were not much different than this," he reflected.

So how does a team that won a disappointing eight times last season begin to improve? With an aggressive new forecheck and more high-octane recruits hand-picked by Cahoon coming in, fans can expect to see fewer remnants of the trap-infested era implemented by former Minuteman leader Joe Mallen. But most of all, it's the mental aspect of the game that will make or break the 2002-03 campaign.

"There's no question that part of the challenge is the preparedness and accountability," Cahoon said. "But believing that they have the tools to succeed is critical as well."

And for most of the team, they already do.

"I think at some point you have to face reality," Sickavish said. "If we play our best and work hard, we can beat teams."

JAMES SCHAFFER/COLLEGIAN

Goaltending is arguably the most important position in hockey.

"Without good goaltending a team can't succeed," Massachusetts Head Coach Don Cahoon said. "It's as simple as that."

As he embarks upon his third year of rebuilding the UMass program, Cahoon looks to sophomore Tim Warner and freshmen Gabe Winer and Mike Waidlich to make the Minutemen a dominating force in Hockey East, one of the best college hockey conferences in the country.

The team as a whole is young with only five upperclassmen, but to put such an important role in the hands of three inexperienced young players can be classified by some as a death sentence. Cahoon doesn't see it that way.

"I don't have any concerns about these guys playing such an important role because they know their responsibilities and I think they're smart enough to deal with it day by day," he said. "I'm confident that between the three of them they can get the job done."

In addition, a lot has changed since last year.

A new goalie coach was added to the coaching staff.

Jim Stewart, a former Boston Bruins goaltender, has been coaching at the collegiate level for nearly 20 years, and joined the program in May. In 1985, he helped coach Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute to a National Championship.

"I like his enthusiasm. I like his teaching style. I like his strong personality and I think he's one of the best recruits we have this year," Cahoon said. "He's remarkably committed to the growth and development of each of our guys."

In addition, a competitive atmosphere has taken over the rink.

At the beginning of last season, it was clear to Warner who would be the starter, and it wasn't him.

"There wasn't much competition because [senior Mike Johnson] was the guy," he said. "He was older, more experienced and just much better than I was. I knew I wasn't going to be playing over him, so I didn't really work as hard as I should have. This year each practice is like a game. I know I need to stay on top of my game. I can't take a day off from practice. I have to work hard every drill, every shot. If not, someone else is going to take my spot."

Although they're new, Winer and Waidlich want to play and both know they have an opportunity.

"All three goalies here are good and it creates that atmosphere that makes you work just that much harder," Winer said. "If they're out there making great saves, then you have to makes saves too and try to outwork the other guys. I just need to be consistent and work hard and hopefully I'll be rewarded."

"I fought just to be here and I'm certainly not going to let an opportunity to play pass me by," Waidlich said. "I'm hopeful that if I work hard and do the best I can that I'll get in to a couple of games."

Cahoon expects these three to battle it out for playing time all season long.

"They've all shown that they're really prepared to work hard at this level and are ready to challenge for the number one spot," he said. "But, no matter how well one of them plays, the other guys will certainly get a chance to show what they can do and what they can contribute."

Warner has the advantage of having played last year and has learned from his past mistakes.

"Last year I didn't push myself as much as I should have," he explained. "That led me to being weak. When Coach called upon me, I wasn't ready to play and I was really nervous. Looking back on it, I've realized my mistakes and tried to correct them over the summer. I needed to get stronger and quicker and I did that."

Knowing he needed to step it up a notch, Warner and his older brother Mike, a forward for the Minutemen, began training with Mike Boyle, the strength and conditioning coach for Boston University, closer to their hometown of Waltham.

"It's a lot better than going to a regular gym. Most of the guys there are doing beach workouts, but at Boyle's they're all athletes, mostly hockey players, and they're all working hard to get stronger, not just look good," said Warner. "It was intense."

At the start of the season, Warner expected the pressure of the position to weigh on his shoulders constantly. But he soon realized that most of the pressure came from himself and that he couldn't afford to do that.

"If I put pressure on myself, I'm just going to make myself more nervous and I'll probably play worse. I can't afford to get down on myself after letting up a goal because then my mind won't be in the game anymore and I'd be letting my teammates down and just making things worse. I just need to be strong," he said. "I know I'm a lot better than I was last year. I just need to prove it."

Cahoon has noticed this change in him.

"He's mentally a lot tougher. I think he's prepared to deal with the highs and lows that come with being a college hockey goaltender," he said.

With a total of ten games under their belt, confidence could be an issue.

But Warner put it best.

"Coach wouldn't have brought us here if he didn't think we could play in this league."

All three goalies know that the only place for this team to go is up. With the addition of Stewart and the competitive atmosphere between them, they know they can only get better.

Warner, Winer and Waidlich are excited to contribute to the success of this team. Whether it be from the crease or the bench has yet to be determined.

ISOM dedicates new building

Bulger, Lombardi and O'Brien cut the ribbon on the Harold Alfond Management Center

DANIEL GOLUBTCHIK/COLLEGIAN

The dedication of the Harold Alfond Management Center will take place tomorrow afternoon at 3 p.m. The building has been in use since this beginning of this school year.

By Morris Singer
Collegian Correspondent

The Harold Alfond Management Center, a new addition to the Isenberg School of Management (ISOM) at the University of Massachusetts, will be officially dedicated today at 3 p.m.

This ceremony will mark the completion of the Alfond Center, a new gateway to the campus. The three-floor addition boasts 47,000 square feet of space and cost $16 million to complete. It features four large classrooms seating between 65 and 90 students, eight smaller rooms for small group discussions and a large student center.

The student center is 50 feet tall, equipped with state-of-the-art amenities for teleconferencing devoted to distance learning. It also features a computer laboratory to replace the smaller labs that existed prior to the addition. Offices for faculty and staff also make up part of the newly constructed space.

In addition, rooms that transition to the new wing have been renovated and now host computer laboratories and office space. Also remodeled was the Flavin Family Auditorium, which is part of the original building.

Construction of the Alfond Center began in spring of 2001, and has continued on schedule for its entirety, opening on time last month. It has been open for classes since the start of the semester.

The construction of the new addition was made possible through $12 million of private donations as well as $4 million in UMass funding.

One of the donors, Eugene M. Isenberg graduated from UMass with the Class of 1950. Isenberg, chairman of Nabors Industries located in Houston, gave $6 million in donations in June 1997. Two million dollars was set aside for an endowed professorship.

Additional donations came from Harold Alfond, chairman of Dexter Shoe Company located in Dexter, Maine, donated $1 million to the building fund in November 1998. The Kresge Foundation also raised $850,000 that was given in the form of a challenge grant.

Friday's ceremony will include a traditional ribbon-cutting ceremony, with student-led tours of the wing and opportunities to learn about business education at UMass today from faculty and students.

UMass President William M. Bulger, Chancellor John V. Lombardi and Thomas O'Brien, ISOM Dean, will speak at the ceremony. The two main benefactors of the construction, Isenberg and Alfond, are also scheduled to speak at the event.

The Isenberg School of Management and the Alfond Center are located north of Massachusetts Avenue across from the Whitmore Administration Building. The event is open to all.

House approves use of force against Iraq

By Tom Raum
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) – The House voted 296-133 Thursday to give President Bush the broad authority he sought to use military force against Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein – with or without U.N. support. The Senate was poised to do the same and to deliver Bush a major national security policy victory.

"The House of Representatives has spoken clearly to the world and to the United Nations Security Council: The gathering threat of Iraq must be confronted fully and finally," Bush said immediately after the vote.

Senate sponsors later succeeded in defeating all efforts to weaken the proposal, opening the way for a final vote late Thursday or early Friday.

"It is clear that we have lost this battle in the Senate," said Sen. Robert Byrd, D-W.Va., the most outspoken Senate foe of the resolution. Byrd accused Congress of "handing the president unchecked authority."

While Bush hailed the strong showing, a majority of House Democrats voted against the resolution – even though their leader, Dick Gephardt of Missouri, was one of its authors.

"The issue is how to best protect America. And I believe this resolution does that," Gephardt said.

The Senate was working on the same resolution, voting 75-25 to choke off delaying tactics and move toward a final vote – expected late Thursday. It voted down a series of efforts to weaken or block the resolution, as did the House.

The administration got a big boost when Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle announced he was putting aside his misgivings to support the president.

"I believe it is important for America to speak with one voice," said Daschle, D-S.D. "It is neither a Democratic resolution nor a Republican resolution. It is now a statement of American resolve and values."

But some influential Democrats remained opposed.

"The power to declare war is the most solemn responsibility given to Congress by the Constitution," said Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass. "We must not delegate that responsibility to the president in advance."

The resolution gives the president wide latitude in defending the United States against the "continuing threat" posed by Baghdad. In a concession to Democrats, it encourages that all diplomatic means be exhausted before force is used, and requires reports to Congress every 60 days once action is taken.

Bush has said he hopes to work with the United Nations, but wanted congressional authority to act independently if necessary. The strong congressional backing he was receiving could bolster U.S. efforts before the U.N. Security Council.

At the State Department, spokesman Richard Boucher said "talks are progressing" at the Security Council on wording of a strong new resolution to disarm Iraq that all five-veto holding permanent members can support. The United States and Britain continue to encounter resistance from France, Russia and China.

The president telephoned Gephardt and House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., to thank them for the vote, then told reporters at a hastily arranged news conference:

"Today's vote ... sends a clear message to the Iraqi regime: You must disarm and comply with all existing U.N. resolutions or [you] will be forced to comply. There are no other options for the Iraqi regime. There can be no negotiations. The days of Iraq acting as an outlaw state are coming to an end," the President said.

The war resolution comes nearly 11 years after Congress voted to give Bush's father similar powers to confront Saddam. In the earlier instance, however, an international coalition was already in place to drive Iraqi invaders out of Kuwait. The current Bush administration has faced resistance from allies in its efforts to form a similar international

Saudi Arabia against Iraq attacks

By Donna Abu-Nasr
Associated Press

RIYADH, Saudi Arabia (AP) – Saudi Foreign Minister Prince Saud said Thursday his country won't participate in any attack on Iraq, but short of that would cooperate in a U.N. effort to address concerns about Iraq's weapons of mass destruction.

Saud also said any action against Iraq should come after the war on terrorism is finished and the terror networks are destroyed.

Otherwise, "terrorists will be able to utilize the war on Iraq to add to the number of issues they will raise against the United States and the West," the prince said in an interview with The Associated Press.

Saud spoke as speculation is mounting about possible U.S. military action against Iraq. The U.N. Security Council is debating whether to adopt a new resolution to toughen U.N. weapons inspections following the Iraqi government's decision to allow inspectors to return after nearly four years.

Saud said that if the new resolution is based on Chapter 7 of the U.N. Charter, "then every country is obligated to cooperate with the United Nations in this.

"This does not mean that every nation is obligated to fight or to use its territory in the conflict but to follow the objective of the resolution by the United Nations," added Saud.

Chapter 7 of the charter authorizes the collective use of force, under the Security Council, in cases of threats to international peace and security.

When asked if Saudi Arabia would send a clear "no" to the United Nations if it came to the use of its territory in a strike against Iraq, Saud said:

"We are not going to join in the military action, but if the United Nations takes a decision in this we will cooperate with it.

"We will cooperate with the United Nations actions like every other country, [but] not as a member of the forces that will be undertaking missions for the United Nations."

Arab nations uniformly have come out against a U.S. military campaign to oust Iraqi President Saddam Hussein, even though there is little love regionally for the Iraqi leader.

Most Arab nations joined the U.S.-led Gulf War coalition that liberated Kuwait in 1991, with Saudi Arabia inviting U.S. troops to the oil-rich kingdom to help defend it against Saddam's forces.

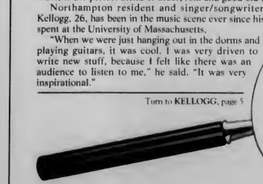
Former UMass prankster turned musical troubadour



By Ashley Hand
Collegian Correspondent

What music genre could the combination of a kazoo, harmonica and guitar possibly create? While I might not know the answer to this, I do know that Steven Kellogg creates it with the ease and grace of a legend. He adds diversity to acoustic rock by conjoining brilliant guitar rhythms with the matchless tones of harmonicas and strangely enough, kazoos. Kellogg's unique hybrid of music is the perfect blend of blues, folk and good old rock 'n' roll.

Northampton resident and singer/songwriter Stephen Kellogg, 26, has been in the music scene ever since his time spent at the University of Massachusetts.

"When we were just hanging out in the dorms and playing guitars, it was cool. I was very driven to write new stuff, because I felt like there was an audience to listen to me," he said. "It was very inspirational."

Nothing stale about Fresh Pasta Co.

By Jocelyn Keith and Lauren Weinstein
Collegian Correspondents

Eating out on the weekends can be such an ordeal, but fear not. We've taken it upon ourselves to help you out each week. No more wondering where to go; we know just the place.

This week: Fresh Pasta Co. in Northampton.

The motto on Fresh Pasta Co.'s take-out menu reads, "Best Pasta in the Valley." This quaint, two leveled restaurant sets nestled on the corner of Masonic and Main streets with a blue, red and green striped awning hanging above two outside tables. One enters the building to notice fresh packaged sauces – believe it or not, their own – as well as fresh pasta ready for one to take home. Its main level and downstairs are quite different. White painted brick and colorful paintings give the upstairs a more fun, relaxed feel, whereas the downstairs creates a more serene and peaceful setting. Yellow painted walls with blue lights and gorgeous paintings surround you while soft Italian music plays subtly in the background. While renovations will occur in January, Fresh Pasta Co. even now possesses a unique feel.

Ed Franco, Fresh Pasta Co.'s new head chef, assured us that with his background, the public was in the right hands, while also enlightening us on what fresh quality food truly means and how rare it is to come across. All of their pasta is hand made from scratch at a warehouse in Leeds nearby. Franco has cooked and managed restaurants in a variety of places, including Belize and New York. Each week he uses his knowledge to create new specials. Having worked at the company for approximately two weeks now, Franco foresees the restaurant heading in new and exciting directions, as various entrees and desserts will be added in the near future.

There are a wide variety of menu items to choose from besides their trademark of fresh pasta. There's the choice of building your own pizza, which includes every toppings from basic pepperoni to not-so-typical brie or salmon. In addition, eight sandwich

Homecoming weekend activities bring back more than football

By Courtney Charles
COLLEGIAN STAFF

This weekend is Homecoming for the University of Massachusetts. The weekend festivities will feature many activities across campus highlighted by the Massachusetts Football team's game against Maine.

"Homecoming is a time to celebrate the work of the current students and faculty," Chancellor John V. Lombardi said.

Events will welcome alumni and friends of the University back to the campus, as well as including students and faculty in the ongoing activities.

Homecoming is a chance to get back together with friends, alumni and students, according to Jennifer Arsenault, associate director for alumni communications.

"Homecoming is a time for alumni and students to be excited about their alma mater," said Arsenault.

Lombardi called Homecoming weekend both celebratory and serious.

"We're doing great things and we're proud of them," said Lombardi. "I think homecoming is a great time for any university. It is one of the high points of the year."

This year's events include the following:

Fri.:

The Chancellor's Medal Award Luncheon (by invitation only) is from 11:30-2:00 p.m. in the Campus Center to honor alumni, faculty and friends.

The Engineering Research Showcase and Laboratory Tour is from 2-3:30 p.m. at the Gunness Student Center in Marcus Hall.

To celebrate the completion of the Harold Alfond Management Center there will be a dedication ceremony at 3 p.m., celebrating the completion of the facility and includes refreshments, student tours and presentations.

UMass women's soccer will face the La Salle Explorers at 3 p.m. on Rudd Field.

UMass field hockey opposes Richmond at 7 p.m. on Garber Field.

The 28th Annual Multiband Pops Concert is at 8 p.m. in the Fine Arts Center and is produced by Jeffrey Holmes. For ticket information call 545-2511.

The Alumni Band Reception is at 10 p.m. in the Student Union Ballroom. To register for the event, visit www.ummalumni.org.

Sat.:

The Alumni Band Breakfast is at 8 a.m. in the Student Union Ballroom. To register for the event, visit www.ummalumni.org.

The Chancellor's Breakfast (by invitation only) is from 9-10:30 a.m. at Hillside where Chancellor John V. Lombardi and Mrs. Cathryn Lombardi recognize members of the University's donor societies for their generous support.

The ROTC Open House is 9 a.m. to 12 p.m. in Building 79 (next to Boden Gym). Call Major Sharon Bucciarelli at 545-2321 for more information.

The Isenberg School of Management's Harold Alfond Management Center Open House is at 10 a.m. For information, call Fricka Prew at 545-5603.

The Communications Department Open House is 10-11:00 a.m. in 120 South College (TV Studio, across from the DuBois Library) and includes a dedication of the TV Studio in memory of Ed O'Neill. For information call Department Chair Michael Morgan at 545-1311.

The School of Nursing Reunion Luncheon and Presentation is from 10 a.m.-2 p.m. in the Cape Cod Lounge of the Student Union Building. The reunion presentation is "Partnerships in Practice" with featured keynote speakers. For information contact SON Development 545-1766 or hao@nursing.umass.edu.

The Homecoming Park/MinuteFan Park is open from 10:00 a.m.-12:45 p.m. at the Warren P. McGuirk Alumni Stadium. The event is co-sponsored by UMass Athletics and the Alumni Association and includes live entertainment and face painting.

The Dedication of the Class of 1950, a new minutemen statue will be held at 10:45 a.m. at the Campus Center pond lawn.

The Class of 1977 25th Reunion Lunch is from 11 a.m.-12:45 p.m. at the Warren P. McGuirk Alumni Stadium. For registration information call (800) 456-8627 or visit www.UMass Alumni.com.

Schell speaks on Iraq situation

By Bridget Henry
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Jonathan Schell lectured yesterday evening at the University of Massachusetts on the threat of nuclear weapons and Iraq. The UMass Political Science Department, the Five College Program in Peace and World Security, and the Citizens for Participation in Political Action sponsored the event. The evening featured a question and answer round following Schell's lecture.

Schell is currently serving as The Nation's peace and disarmament correspondent as well as the Harold Willens Peace Fellow at the Nation Institute. He is the author of The Fate of the Earth, and The Abolition, and is a former writer and editor of The New Yorker.

"As we meet here tonight, the hour is dark and the stakes could not be higher," Schell began.

He addressed the seriousness of the Iraq situation and the threat faced by nations who answer to nuclear power, as well as the implications for the countries who brandish it. He then referred to the onset of the Nuclear Age, by posing the question, "How did we get to this dilemma?"

He traced nuclear weaponry back to its inception in 1945 with comments by scientist Leo Szilard, a key developer in the Manhattan project, and his interpretation of what nuclear power meant to the future of the world. According to Schell, Szilard noted that no one country could possess all of the world's nuclear power. Szilard, he said he also realized that any group could get a hold of the knowledge to make nuclear weapons, and predicted the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction.

Jonathan Schell, the nation's peace and disarment correspondent, spoke yesterday at UMass.

Schell then moved on to the beginning of the Cold War, focusing on the arms race that took place between the United States and the former Soviet Union. He noted that the two countries elected to live in a state of mutually assured destruction, with neither country realistically considering a preemptive strike. At this, Schell casually said that Josef Stalin had killed far more people than Saddam Hussein.

Schell then discussed the unofficial abandonment of nuclear deterrence once the Cold War ended, stating that Americans and Russians had a new and important question to answer. The question, Schell acknowledged, was, "If you aren't fighting anymore, do you still need the weapons?"

He proposed that the United States and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republic had two choices: get rid of the weapons, or hang on to them in case you need them in the future. Instead of answering the question, Schell maintains that the United States simply forgot about it. He then humorously supposed that.

"Following the crumbling of the U.S.S.R., it is as if [the policy] was 'everyone sit tight on top of their mountain of nuclear weapons and hope no one does anything crazy.'"

Schell called this a "state of inattention," and pointed out that while there was no longer a real need for nuclear power, the weapons were not destroyed. He claims that this sent messages to other countries, which believed that they had a right to nuclear weapons when they saw the United States was not discarding its own. He pointed to the 1998 incident in which India fired eight nuclear weapons at Pakistan, who responded by launching seven.

"Szilard's prophecy," stated Schell, "had come true." Schell continued to emphasize that while the United States had taken no nuclear action since Hiroshima, the weapons remained.

"The weapons hung around like characters in search of an author ... but on Sept. 11, that changed." Schell believes that post-Sept. 11, 2001 the question of what to do with the United States nuclear arsenal was answered by the Bush administration. Schell believes that without the Sept. 11 attacks a war with Iraq would not even be considered. He again referred to the Stalin regime, emphasizing that the United States did not take steps to wage war with the Soviet Union despite atrocities committed by Stalin. Schell asserts that Hussein "is a target of convenience," a catalyst for the Bush administration to begin its campaign for military supremacy.

Schell supported this with a quote from Bush which states, "We will not permit the world's worst regimes to threaten us with nuclear weapons" and with wording from the actual Iraq resolution. The wording repeatedly mentioned the need to maintain military dominance in order to combat nuclear proliferation. Schell claims that the Bush administration seeks a world in which the United States has a right to military dominance and the ousting of regimes.

He believes that military action against Iraq will only result in a temporary solution, while necessitating more permanent, direct intervention. Schell sees the resolution to go to war with Iraq as an attempt to implement an imperial system – first in Iraq, and then throughout the world.

"Men love power. Power corrupts," Schell had stated earlier in the speech, describing the threat posed by the Bush administration's declarations of superiority. Schell believes that the administration's power exists unchecked, given the current congressional stance on the Iraq resolution.

"In Congress today we see people throwing away their power," Schell continued, addressing the resolution's ramifications on the future of constitution. He accused the House of Representatives of not speaking out against the resolution and deplored it for voting in favor of a war with Iraq. He made predictions that the Senate would follow suit, and stated,

"The balance of power is being severely eroded. Civil liberties will follow." He specifically targeted Congressional Democrats, saying that they had "folded in the face of presidential pressure" and citing their apparent support of the war as the "cowardice of those who are supposed to fulfill their responsibilities to the Constitution."

"It is no accident the decision to go to war in Iraq was defiant of the Constitution," stated Schell, who believes that the Constitution becoming obsolete will be the first step toward the end of the U.S. republic.

"It is not a secret anymore, this idea of global military supremacy ... Right now, we have to decide if we want to be an empire or a republic."

coalition.

In the House, 126 of the chamber's 208 Democrats voted against the war resolution.

Still, that was stronger support than the first President Bush received in 1991 when the House voted 250-183 to authorize force against Iraq.

House Democrats urged the president to work closely with the United Nations before going it alone against Iraq.

"Completely bypassing the U.N. would set a dangerous precedent that would undoubtedly be used by other countries in the future to our and the world's detriment," said Gephardt.

The House earlier rejected, by 270-155, the main challenge to the White House-backed resolution, a proposal backed by a majority of Democrats that obliged the president to return to Congress for a second vote on the use of American force against Iraq after he decides that cooperative efforts with the United Nations are futile.

Rep. John Spratt, D-S.C., said that without a multilateral approach, "this will be the United States versus Iraq and in some quarters the U.S. versus the Arab and the Muslim world."

The Senate also turned aside efforts to put more checks on the president's war-making authority. It rejected, 75-24, a proposal by Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman Carl Levin, D-Mich., that was similar to the Spratt proposal in the House.

On the key 75-25 Senate vote to draw debate to a close, 28 Democrats joined 47 Republicans in voting for the measure. Only two Republicans voted against it: Lincoln Chaffee of Rhode Island and Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania.

In the closing hours of debate, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., said the decision to back the resolution was "the hardest decision I've ever had to make, but I cast it with conviction. I want this president, or any future president, to be in the strongest possible position to lead our country, at the United Nations or at war."

Meanwhile, retired Marine Gen. Anthony Zinni, former head of U.S. Central Command, said Thursday that the Bush administration seems unnecessarily rushed about taking on Iraq. Zinni, a former U.S. envoy to the Mideast for the Bush administration, said he considers Saddam "deterrable and containable at this point."

"I'm not convinced we need to do this now," Zinni said at a foreign-policy forum.

Young speaks about 9/11 monuments and memory

By Anne Lee
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

James Young, professor of English and chairman of the department of Judaic and Near Eastern Studies, spoke yesterday on "Memory and the Monument after 9/11," in the Massachusetts Room at the Mullins Center.

"It has been known that monuments have long sought to be the focus for memory," said Young as he discussed the questions behind the significance of monuments. However, he says that monuments and memories are not elastic.

Young believes that often times monuments have been built to show what monuments can't do instead of what they can. He went on to say that since most monuments are government-sponsored, the monuments try to hold a universal symbol, which they ultimately do not.

"It seems that to memorialize becomes a substitute to action," Young said.

Young explained examples of monuments in countries like Germany and the Holocaust memorials; he said that it's harder to fully reflect on a monument that had been built in the country where the crimes have been perpetrated, simply because of the irony behind the situation.

He said that there becomes an inadequate response to memorial, where: "In the end the burden of memories is in and to the people who come looking for it," said Young.

As a frequent commentator on efforts to memorialize Ground Zero in New York City, Young moved on with his talk with how the plans of creating a memorial for Ground Zero can take another approach in memorializing and remembering those lost in the tragic events of Sept. 11, 2001.

"This plan should not be to repair or take its place. Tell how they lived, not how they died and regenerate life of life itself," Young said.

He explained that the memorial culture in many parts of the world is to plant trees. Whether the tragedy was due to a natural disaster, such as the Kobe earthquake in Japan or the Holocaust, each tree is planted to represent every person who died. Young said that this "creates a memorial matrix," that is separate and together where the world unifies memory instead of viewing it as competing and conflicting agendas.

"Monuments live solely by the consent of the public," said Young.

However, he mentioned that the Ground Zero Project, which is being contracted with the Lower Manhattan Developmental Corporation (LMDC), often times looks toward surrounding business owners and local government, not the actual mourners for the consent.

Young emphasized that "memory needs to cultivate and to be tended to."

"Let life remember life," Young said.

Young's lecture was the first in a series of four Distinguished Faculty Lectures. The lecture was sponsored by the UMass Office of the Chancellor and the Office of the Provost.

National Coming Out Day:

A big step forward

Today, Oct. 11, is National Coming Out Day. Back in 1987, activists marched on Washington to demand equal rights for homosexuals and lesbians. Now fifteen years later, this day marks an annual call to those who are still hidden about their sexuality and asks them to come out of the proverbial closet.

The significance of such a day should not be downplayed. For homosexuals everywhere, coming out is often one of the most important moments of their lives. It is an equally challenging as it is exhilarating.

It means exposing oneself to the risk of discrimination of personal harm that accompanies being openly gay. As rosy as we'd all like to make the world seem, this threat of violence is still very real in our world.

Yet despite all the potential dangers, they are equaled, if not surpassed, by the personal pride, confidence, and self esteem that are part of being open about oneself. Often the assumption is made that as life is easier being straight, then why would a person not want to pass as a heterosexual, as many gays can, and did throughout the earlier years of their lives. What is forgotten in this belief though, is the fact that in playing the role of a straight person, these men and women are being denied the right to be who they really are. They are being asked to hide their true selves so the rest of the world doesn't have to deal with such issues.

This is wrong, and National Coming Out Day is the public group symbol of an event that happens all over the world every day of the year. People come out all the time, risks be damned. They have decided to take the next big step in their lives and start saying what they think, and acting the way they want, never cowering in the corner of the closet ever again.

Just as important in taking this step to come out is the need for allies to help and support those who have chosen to be who they are. Many straight people out there have favorable political and social views of gays, but often act like the silent majority. Those making the most noise are those opposed to homosexuals and lesbians, claiming them to be deviants, freaks of nature, mistakes, and symbols of evil.

Supporters of homosexuals and lesbians need to make their voices heard so that those who have made the brave step to come out realize that they are not alone. The most clear way that support and reassurance can be shown is of course through speaking out. There are other ways though. Today, whether you are homosexual, lesbian, bisexual, trans-gendered, or a straight ally, wear a white t-shirt and jeans. This simple, common outfit that almost every person owns, will be a sign of unity for all those who wish to make a stand and strike down oppression.

The change in society begins with each and every one of us. The next time you're tempted to insult gay people, even if it's not serious, just stop and think for a second. Don't just consider the views that the statement expresses, but consider that one of the people among the group may actually be in the closet.

So today if you walk by the Student Union steps around noon, and see a rally with a bunch of people telling stories about their lives, give one of them a thumbs up or a pat on the back: they just did something of great importance.

Stopping the ride of racism

EDUARDO BUSTAMANTE

Throughout history, words like communist, nigger, faggot, spic, jew, racist, and bigot have been used to stop rational thought and invite deplorable acts of violence. Reactions to such words have led to lynching and murder.

I used the latter two words – racist and bigot – in my recent editorial, "If it wasn't broke, you shouldn't have taken a hammer to it." In my attempt to show that actively helping to restore academic advising to minority support services was in everyone's best interest I fell into a trap. I realize that my stating that anyone who disagrees with me is wrong was in itself an act of bigotry. I concede that was a mistake.

My admitted bigotry invited the expected response from those who read it. They got so stuck on the powerful words and bigoted statements at the beginning and end of the column that they failed to process the material in between. Many were sent into irrational fits of "it's crap" and "it pisses me off."

Some even implied that the article was "fanatical" and had "nothing reasonable to say." They missed the substance of the article. Some took what I said out of context. At no point did I state that ALANA issues are "the only worthy cause on campus." Nor did I personally attack Chancellor Lombardi.

The criticism I received was also for the most part positive, constructive, and encouraging. Those who objected all tied the restoration of academic support programs with the plights of other struggling groups on campus. They said, "We don't have the money to provide minority support programs that include academic advising. It's a fact of life."

Objections must be brought out into the open before real progress can be made. So I thank everyone who raised this objection.

Here is my response. As presented in the original article, both the interview with Sidonio Ferrera, head of all four minority support programs, and public statements by then Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs Javier Cevallos and ex-Chancellor Marcelette Williams establish that this was not a financial decision. It was a decision based on the belief that having all academic advising in the same place would be more effective for students, and would make more sense than separating them. Furthermore, a committee was assigned to plan the maneuvering of minority support programs in case further cuts in funding proved necessary. After months of meeting, this committee found that the most cost effective change would be the merging of secondary services, i.e. tutoring and peer mentoring.

And so, it is not "a fact of life" that these programs don't have academic advising because of finance. I did not link this argument to the financial plea of other groups struggling around campus, because the problem here is not one of finance. And anyone who says that it does so while overlooking the fact that the most effective financial solution is not the one that was chosen.

A second, more defensive and irrational objection stemmed from the strong words and tone of the first and last paragraphs as well. They said essentially, "I am not a racist. And just because I am not actively involved in restoring the minority academic support programs doesn't make me a racist." First, this statement is misleading. The article actually read, if "you believe that it's pointless to restore these programs because the academic race gap is due to genetics – you are a racist." That is clearly a different statement.

However, this second objection raises an important question: Can one do nothing and still be a racist? It depends on how you define "racism." Somewhere along the line I came across a very intriguing definition, as opposed to defining racism simply as "hate of another race," it was defined as "a system of power based on race." If such is the case, and one is benefiting from this system, and is not actively involved in fighting it, could you say that through his cooperation he supports the racist system? If so, should that individual be considered a "racist?"

Imagine, if you will, that you are on an escalator powered by racism. The exploitation of certain groups powers you up the escalator. The blatant racist tries to get the escalator moving as fast as possible by maximizing exploitation. But what about the person who just stands and lets the escalator uplift him, but doesn't say anything? Is this person who accepts the benefits of racism and doesn't actively oppose it a "passive racist?" When viewed in this light one is "not racist" only to the extent that they actively refuse to use that escalator and try to have it stopped. The removal of the minority academic support programs raises the possible loss of roughly 1500 minority students over the next few years. I am going to hoot and holler to stop the escalator.

Dream makers, nightmarish realities

YOUSEF MUNAYYER

While many of you are reading this I am somewhere above the northeast on a return flight from the nation's capital. I have been in Washington, D.C. [Note: Dick Cheney and the sniper have still not been found] the past few days attending some press events on foreign policy.

One press event, held at the National Press Club, was about focusing on foreign policy and in particular the situation with Iraq. As this press conference was going on, the House of Representatives was voting on Presidents Bush's resolution, House Resolution 114, authorizing the president to use force against Iraq, passed later on that afternoon.

However, I have never seen so much opposition to the war as I have seen in these past few days. At the conference, we were informed that over 200 colleges and universities across the country have held anti-war events and protests including several in the Five College area.

Along with me were 24 other columnists from around the United States, from places such as UMass to as far as the University of Washington and as close as Harvard U. I did not encounter one opinion all day that supported the war.

There were many views that I had heard that have not yet been debated and need to be debated before any actions can justifiably be taken. I have heard so many anti-war views I find it difficult to pick a place to begin. I also wonder how this resolution has passed. Well, I understand that the majority of congressmen voted for it yesterday, however, I refuse to believe they accurately reflect the views of the nation.

I want to start with the reasons President Bush has outlined in his Oct. 7 address to the nation from Ohio for attacking Iraq.

The president claims that Iraq is a hostile regime that has the capability to harm the United States and its allies in the region.

However, if we are to pursue this "Bush Doctrine," this insane ideology of world domination, are we prepared to reflect it upon other nations like Iraq? What statement are we making to the rest of the world when we attack a nation preemptively without cause? The idea of a preemptive strike against Iraq, or the ideology that justifies it, will also justify an attack on China, India, Pakistan, Iran, Russia and any other nations that has the capabilities to harm the United States. Obviously that is not why we are thinking of attacking Iraq. To paraphrase what one speaker said yesterday: Iraq is as dangerous to the United States as a mouse is to me in my house. At most, it is a nuisance.

The war is about oil. I don't think it can be said any simpler than that. The administration that is in power today has expressed in the past that it wants to seek continuous domination in the world, will destroy any power seeking similar status, and will dominate the world's energy supply through the Gulf to make these psychotic views possible. Think I went too far?

> "The idea of a preemptive strike against Iraq, or the ideology that justifies it, will also justify an attack on China, India, Pakistan..."

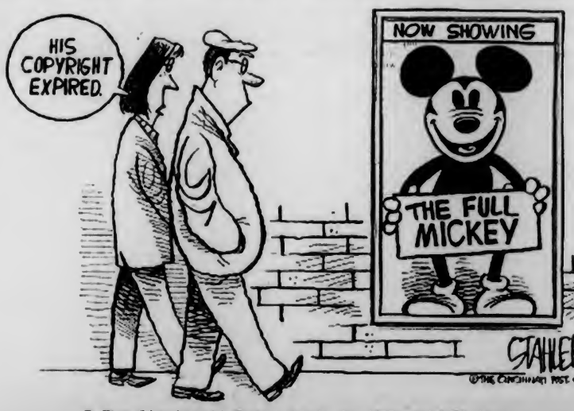
Absolutely not. I ask you all to read and review the Carter doctrine and then read Dick Cheney's National Energy Policy Report. It's all there in black and white; we have madmen in the White House.

This war is not about weapons of mass destruction. This war is not about inspectors. This war is not about human rights. The United States has proved how much it cares about those so-called ideals that it holds by exercising hypocritical foreign policy in the past.

This war is not about U.N. resolutions. In fact, if the United States were sincere about U.N. resolutions it would respect other resolutions that it has signed. And while I'm on resolutions, I want to bring up a very important point. I had a chance to speak with one of the top International Law experts in the country from Princeton University, and we both agreed on something that needs to be thought about. The resolution that ended the Gulf War is eerily similar to the Treaty of Versailles that ended World War I. If history is an accurate indicator, and it has proved to be so in the past, we are in for a lot of trouble.



Those who have studied the world wars know how extremely punitive the treaty of Versailles was. The U.N. resolution ending the Gulf War is worse. After Iraq was completely devastated and its people ill and starved the resolution slapped sanctions on Iraq and forced it to comply with weapons inspections. Has history taught us nothing? We know what happened to Germany after World War I.

If history is repeating itself, are we in for World War III? Have we even considered this? What if Kurds declare independence and the Turks get involved? What if Iraq hits Israel with chemical weapons and Israel responds with nukes? Are we prepared for full-scale regional or global nuclear warfare? Wasn't this what we spent the past 60 years trying to prevent? Was not the United Nations established to prevent another war? President Bush shrugs his shoulders to all these questions. That's probably because he honestly isn't smart enough to answer them, but his administration can, they just don't care to.

I can only say that a war against Iraq is a big mistake. It would create more anti-American sentiment and give the bin Ladens of this world more to rant about. It would be against our national interest, even if oil-guzzling hawks tell us otherwise. It can lead to more widespread deadly war that we have not yet witnessed on this earth. And it will definitely be a major turning point in history.

I just wish that as this administration crushes the dreams of Iraqi men, women and children that it realizes that it continues to create dreams of martyrdom across the world.

Letter to the Editor:

To the Editor:

I am writing this piece in response to Regan McKendry's editorial entitled "The Struggle of Being Different: Minorities' Gift from God" which appeared on the Oct. 10 issue of The Collegian. I have "digested" your article; you come off as trying to see things from, the point of view of a racial minority, of which you do not belong. Granted, you do belong to a category of society which has undergone and still endures much discrimination, but until you can be identified as a racial minority in this white privileged country, you can only attempt and not succeed in fully empathizing.

American society has come to be shaped in that as a white man, you wield privileges that minorities can never enjoy. The fact that you are of a minority sexual orientation can easily be masked and the mere pigmentation of your skin will entitle you to have at your dispense opportunities unattainable by racial minorities. I am in no way, shape or form suggesting that you hide your sexuality to get special perks; I am merely making the point that attempting to equate the disadvantages faced by racial minorities and sexual ones is futile and unproductive.

In the piece, you say, "People can either let their minority define them and be what their entire life is based on, or they can simply let it be another part of what makes them who they are. I usually try to ascribe to the latter." This is a typical ideology of a person from the perspective of the unaffected outsider. The minority status of races that are non-white is a socially constructed phenomenon and trying to dismiss the impact of society's perception and behavior towards these races is a dangerous and ignorant one. I am sure that there have been tons of people who have said the same thing to themselves that you have in starting with a change in themselves and rejecting the influence of outsiders. Reality check; you live in a society. Interaction with others is a part of life and their perception of you will have an impact on your day to day existence, whether you want to acknowledge it or not.

People of color are seen as just that: outside the norm of white. Call me cynical but there is no such thing as being color-blind when it comes to individuals. I know that being college students, we are expected to be idealists and have aspirations of changing this world and making it a better place. But the fact of the matter remains that we live in a racist, classist, sexist society, which has a nasty habit of lumping people together. Races are generally easier to distinguish and therefore are more likely to suffer the consequences.

Which brings me to the issue of the importance of the ALANA support programs which you write off as being unnecessary: "What entitles a student from an ethnic minority to a special advisor, one that other students don't have access to," you ask. This is not about entitlement to anything. These support programs were essential and fundamental in helping to bring ALANA students in a setting, which would help to facilitate their academic growth. These "special" advisors were trained in dealing with people of color who in turn had special needs because of their underprivileged status in society. Believe it or not, being reminded everyday that you are "different" has an ultimate impact on how your life will turn out, and these advisors had a good grasp of that. Like you said, it is not a level playing field that we are treading on and these programs helped many students in trying to maneuver it.

These special advisors also gave ALANA students what they are now lacking in dealing with other advisors. I have heard time and time again of ALANA students who have gone to white advisors only to be disappointed in hearing what they have to say. The general consensus is that these advisors discourage people of color from aspiring to go into certain fields. So can you really blame them for trying to seek our people who will support them? Again, it goes back to empathy and understanding the trials that a Latino, Asian or black student goes through in a predominantly white university.

The disadvantages of being of a racial minority far outweigh the advantages which you claim come with being of a minority group, so what is wrong with trying to compensate for it? Is vying for a safe haven too much to ask?

Peacock spreads her feathers in Northampton

By Johnny Donaldson

ALICE PEACOCK
Iron Horse
Oct. 2

NORTHAMPTON – Alice Peacock played at the Iron Horse Music Club in downtown Northampton, with local folk star Stephen Kellogg and Boston-based country thrush Lori McKenna opening for her on Oct. 2. I arrived an hour early for an interview with the 32-year-old singer, and found myself amid a last minute sound check for the concert, only two hours away.

While Peacock and her band ironed out the last few wrinkles before the show began, I listened to a copy of her CD, a twangy pop stunner that has made many critics draw comparison, quite deservingly, to artists such as Sheryl Crow and Joni Mitchell.

Peacock is flattered to be mentioned in the same category as said acts, and why shouldn't she be? She's a natural, a star in the making, a woman whose rootsy blend of rock, pop and folk will one day make her a multi-platinum success like Crow – or John Mayer, a label-mate who provides harmony vocals on her song "Bliss."

Her show was a rousing success. Her songs are catchy and hooky, the kinds of tunes that gets toes-a-tappin'. But a studio-produced album and a live concert are miles apart. Anyone who a favorite artist has disappointed with a lackluster on stage performance knows what I am saying. The songs may be the same, technically, but something is off, the electricity that was created in the studio is lost on stage by the musician's lack of feeling for the material.

Peacock has no such problem. She feels the songs, and, through the magic of osmosis, the audience feels them too. She and her band play the hell out of the music in order to get us to truly experience them. The concert was lustful, hungry, alive – never once did I experience a moment of boredom.

Before the concert began, I had the opportunity to interview Peacock. And as the moments to interview began to shrink down to zero, I got ever more nervous. I had never done an interview, and this one – the one that will make me an interview virgin no longer – was given to me at the last minute, with only a few hours to properly prepare. The knot in my throat was the size of a Rottweiler by the time I stepped into the hallowed halls of the Iron Horse.

At around 6 p.m., I got to sit down with Mrs. Alice Peacock. We went from the hectic noise and bustle of the main hall into the greenroom, a basement room filled with a jumble of old, basementy chairs and sofas. I take a seat across from her, pulling out my notepad and questions and begin the process of the interview.

One of the first things you notice about Alice Peacock is how nice she is – well that, and her natural, everyday beauty. When we meet, she is the first to extend her hand, and offer a smile. She offers reassurances as I explain that this was the first time I ever did this. She's warm and smiling and down-to-earth. Afterwards, she unhesitatingly agrees to sign my CD. There's never a sense that celebrity – when she receives it (there is no if) – will turn her into a spoiled rich brat.

In the span of fifteen minutes, our conversation covers a broad range of topics, from Peacock's influences to her advice for aspiring musicians. ("Just do it," she says, taking a cue from Nike. "Get out there and play as much as you can. The more you do, the more people you will meet.")

Among her influences are the likes of Tom Petty, Carole King and Neil Young. Especially Neil Young. "If I could play with Neil Young, I could die happy," she said when I ask her what artists she would like to collaborate with. (Peter Gabriel and Sting are also on the list.)

When asked what songs people respond to most, she names "Northern Star," a smoky, quiet, piano-driven chanteuse number far different from the rest of her self-titled major label debut album (it's a hidden track). She may be honored by the Crow/Shawn Colvin comparisons but she says, "People like to make comparisons. Music is my own thing...I'm a singer/songwriter, but the show also rocks...I like hooky songs [with] a lot of passion and soul." (Author's note: Boy does she like the hooky songs – they have a tendency to get stuck in the cranial.)

She prefers the intimacy of performing to the technicality of recording: "I prefer performing more. I'm not a big tech person. Audience is integral, I like to make it a warm environment." She does so by using candlelit tables and low lighting. The former theater major isn't entirely averse to returning to acting, but, "For me, I have to kind of choose. Music fed my soul, but I love acting too...I love the fear of 'oh. God! What if I screw up...'" If she did have a dual track career, she would like to follow in the quirky paths of musician-actors Tom Waits and Chris Isaak – even if she isn't a big fan of Isaak's Showtime television series.

Even if her career is just starting to bud, Peacock has compiled enough personal highlights that picking out a single favorite is hardly an easy task. Playing the Newport Folk Festival is among the tops, and for her, there is a certain validation about opening for John Mellencamp on his current tour. Though she isn't in it for the money, Peacock is refreshingly honest about the possibility of stardom. As she puts it, "I'm not anti-success." When asked about the future of her music, Peacock hopes that her "writing will grow...I hope to continue to write catchy and deep music."

Finally, for those curious, the five CDs that Alice Peacock is listening to right now are: Peter Gabriel's new one, Up; Robert Bradley's Blackwater Surprise; Tom Petty's Greatest Hits; The Heed (personal friends of Peacock, who says that they are a good jam band), and Mellencamp's Scarecrow. Just a little tidbit for those who are already fans of Alice Peacock, and for those who will be.

Mixed bag for Good Charlotte

GOOD CHARLOTTE
The Young and the Hopeless
Daylight/Epic

Punk rock has changed a lot in the 25 or so years since it first gained prominence with bands like the Sex Pistols and in clubs like CBGB's. Some hardcore punk fans are upset with the new direction that the current punk scene is taking. They moan about how poppy it has gotten, about how it no longer is true punk. The new generation of punk rockers grew up on a diet of Green Day and Blink-182 rather than G.G. Allin or the Misfits. The music is less about anarchy and rebellion than it is about actual music – melody, harmony, rhythm and all that jazz.

That's not to say that every act that appears on the Warped Tour makes good music. In fact there are a lot of punk-pop acts that just are just terrible, or are mediocre retreads at best. They have studied the works of Green Day, but have learned nothing from them. It's all snot-nosed, attitudinal bluster and little else.

Good Charlotte was never part of that bad side of the punk world. The Maryland quartet made the best of shoddy childhoods, made good on the promise of the first half of its name. Their self-titled debut was a hook-fest filled with catchy, jump-up-and-down rhythms and driven by smart, personal lyrics that touched chords with anguished teenaged listeners. The group of barely out of high school musicians included twins Joel (the singer) and Benji (the guitarist), along with drummer Aaron, guitarist Billy and bassist Paul (the members all ditched their last names).

They played songs about Joel and Benji's absentee father, about the torment of high school, and about the kind of things that connected them with the soon to be millions of fans they would receive.

On the heels of the success that they received from that album, they returned with their sophomore effort, entitled The Young and the Hopeless. Alas, like many a sophomore effort, it doesn't succeed to the level of Good Charlotte. It's still a good album, but only 75 percent as good as it could've been.

The leading single off the album is "Lifestyles of the Rich and Famous," an appropriately bratty skewer aimed at celebrities who whine about the hardships of being a celebrity. Like the best songs on the first album, "Lifestyles" pogos up and down on an ebullient wave of punk-pop attitude. So does "The Anthem," an ode to being independent. (Which is what every teen wants nowadays, isn't it?)

People have accused Good Charlotte of not being punk enough. But GC (as they have previously abbreviated themselves) is beyond trying to prove its own punkocity. (Punkness? Punkitude? Is there even a word, or is it all intangible?) The band's members are not afraid to let themselves be vulnerable, as on "Hold On" or "Say Anything," fragile, slow down-tempo tunes – or as down-tempo can get in the world of punk-pop. Even on the more raucous songs, they display vulnerability like the "Story of My Old Man" in which they talk exclusively about Joel and Benji's father.

Unfortunately, there's much on the album that fails. "Girls and Boys" is a clinking little number far too reminiscent of a thin late '80s pop song. It's minor at best, terrible at worst. And there are a few songs that sound just like every other generic song in the pop-punk catalogue.

It isn't surprising that Good Charlotte falls short of its first album – It has happened to many an artist. And by no means does it mean they have failed – only a few songs do. The Young and the Hopeless is an album still worth buying, especially if you are a fan of Dickies pants, skateboards and the Warped Tour.

Pearl Street hosts Battle of the Bands

Local bands and fans get a chance to win big tonight in the seventh Battle of the Bands, hosted by Madd Muzic at the Pearl Street Nightclub in Northampton.

The event is part of a series called "Gaining New Ground," a string of performances that has given local bands the opportunity to play professionally.

Tonight's show will feature the second place winners of the past six battles. The winner of this battle will be booked to clubs in any five northeast cities of their choice and will also be given a free recording session in order to produce a demo CD.

Lu Rok, booking agent for Madd Muzic, helps local bands in Western Massachusetts grow big.

"I have been doing shows for three years at Pearl Street," Rok said. "For these battles, we're selling out."

Rok wants to help local bands get big, because he feels that they are original. He does not support cover bands.

"If you get out of your car and get into a club and hear the same thing...that's no good...that's why I like Northampton," he said. "It supports original musicians."

"Gaining New Ground" is open to a mixed crowd of all ages.

"Sometimes kids under 10 years old come here with their parents," Rok said. "It's all about the all-ages."

He described the atmosphere with a smile on his face: "These kids look out for each other...it's like a community.

Several raffle prizes will be given away to fans tonight. Among these is a pair of Tool tickets to the upcoming Mullins Center show. Other prizes include a free tattoo donated by Solid Custom Tattoo in Amherst, movie passes, tickets to upcoming Madd Muzic events and free CDs.

So inspirational, in fact, that as a freshman, this former student took it upon himself to record his very first demo of solo tunes entitled Invest In Us. It sold around campus and enabled him to play local gigs around campus as well as the Five College area.

Before his experience at UMass, Kellogg had his doubts about pursuing his musical quest. Kellogg's interest in music and acting had roots all the way back to junior high, but as he explained, "when you're younger, you [eel like maybe a [music/acting career] is harder to obtain. Everyone is asking 'What's your fallback?' So then you're like, 'Oh I better get one!' Once I got to UMass, I really, really got more involved in the music thing."

The supportive influence at UMass was not the only contributing factor. The unique flavor in Amherst and Northampton's local music scene also fueled Kellogg's pursuit of a music career.

"The Northampton music scene definitely played a part; it's filled with really good songwriters, and it opened my eyes to a lot of different kinds of music that I wasn't in the know about," he recalled. "It was the first time I got to see solo artists doing their thing. Before, I saw mostly big rock concerts. Once I saw all these solo musicians, it made the idea more real. It's great to be in a small town and experience that."

However, Kellogg's days spent at UMass weren't always focused on his musical talents.

"I was a communications major, so I took a lot of film classes. We always had these assignments where you had to film stuff, so me and my buddies would go to the DC or something, and one of us would be secretly filming. We'd walk in there dressed up in full mafia gear or wearing little tanks tops over sweaters and sweatshirts just to see peoples' reactions. And other times we'd walk around campus, and when someone would walk by us, we'd just stop dead in our tracks and salute them. It sounds geeky, but it was cool at the time!"

With seven albums and a countless number of gigs under his belt, Stephen Kellogg has been able to play shows with various popular artists, sharing bills with Jeffrey Gaines, John Mayer, Matti Nathanson and many others. Musically, he feels this has been his biggest achievement thus far.

"Playing with these artists has just been incredible," he said. "Once in New York City, Melissa Etheridge jumped on stage at the gig I was playing, and I got to perform with her. And Jeffrey Gaines was someone I dreamt about when I was younger, and now I'm playing gigs with him!

choices line the menu, one of which (the grilled smoked turkey breast on a foccacia roll-up) caught our eye.

It's not hard to believe that we had a difficult time deciding what to order. Ultimately, Lauren decided on one of their fresh pasta dishes to see if it lived up to its name. She opted for the fettuccine with sun dried tomato and fresh mozzarella, which thoroughly impressed her with its quality and taste of the pasta.

Jocelyn decided to give one of the entrees a try. Eggplant Parmesan with linguine was the final verdict. The consistency and softness of the eggplant combined with the melted mozzarella cheese was simply amazing. Its portion also proved impressive, as it was enough for her to take home for later.

If you're in the mood for something a little more unique, then check out the "Special Entrees." These range from $9.95 to $16.95. One such item on this weeks list was scallop piquante with diced tomatoes and fresh spinach. All specials include pasta and bread and are generous portions.

While, Franco claimed that one of the most popular dishes at the restaurant is the sweet potato ravioli, other good deals that we picked up on were the rotisserie chicken, which includes half a chicken served with your choice of pasta and sauce, and, for your fish cravings, grilled salmon and spinach over pasta. Also note that there are salads, breads, calzones and soups (seasonal) on the menu as well.

While at the restaurant, expect to see usual mix of college students and adults. The atmosphere and location make the Fresh Pasta Co. a good choice for a romantic evening as well as an entire sports team's night out or an outgoing with friends.

Mouth watering yet? Fresh Pasta Co.'s hours run Monday through Thursday 11 a.m. to 9 p.m., Friday and Saturday 11 a.m. to 10 p.m. and Sundays 4-9 p.m. Reservations are recommended for Fridays and Saturdays.

But don't expect to spend a lot of time there, though: we experienced quick, friendly service.

Now I'm friends with him! It's awesome."

But fame isn't fazing this talented performer. While Kellogg is eager to begin his national tour and get his music out to the west coast, he prides himself on being a down-to-Earth guy.

"I just want to stay calm and enjoy my life," he explained. "There are some people out there that just flaunt their success so bad that they miss the point; they don't get to chill out. I'm into being normal, keeping a balance of things."

Stephen Kellogg has enormous potential and all the makings of a very promising future. When you add up his killer sound, captivating stage presence and great attitude, it can only equal success. Stephen Kellogg will perform at the Iron Horse in Northampton on Saturday, Oct. 12 at 7 p.m. Tickets are available by calling the Northampton Box Office at (413) 586-8686, at For The Record in Amherst or at the door the night of the show.

The decision of ownership of Barry Bonds' 73rd home run ball from last season will go to court after three tries at mediation. The ball is rumored to be worth nearly $1.5 million.

Around the horn

BASEBALL

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) – After a third mediation attempt failed, the legal tug-of-war over Barry Bonds' 73rd home run ball will go to trial.

Retired Bay Area Judge Coleman Fannin tried to get both sides to settle out of court, but lawyers for Alex Popov and Patrick Hayashi said in a joint statement that the difference of opinion would have to be resolved at trial.

DETROIT (AP) – The Detroit Tigers hired former star shortstop Alan Trammell as manager, hoping he can turn around a franchise that has endured nine straight losing seasons.

Trammell, who becomes Detroit's fifth manager since Sparky Anderson's 17-season tenure ended in 1995, was San Diego's first base coach the past three seasons.

ANAHEIM, Calif. (AP) – Thousands of Anaheim Angels fans scrambled to buy World Series tickets at Edison Field, with up to 20,000 fans charging the gates and police in riot gear wading through the crowd. No fights or arrests were reported.

ST. PETERSBURG, Fla. (AP) – A friend of Arizona Diamondbacks outfielder Quinton McCracken used his bank account number to steal more than $186,000.

Stephen Haase, 38, of St. Petersburg, was charged with one count of scheming to defraud. He was being held at the Pinellas County Jail with bail set at $200,000.

AUTO RACING

CONCORD, N.C. (AP) – A driver on the minor league ARCA series crashed into a wall and seconds later was broad-sided by another car, killing him and injuring the other driver.

Eric Martin radioed his team, "I'm all right" after he spun and rammed the wall backward coming out of the fourth turn during practice at Lowe's Motor Speedway. But the other car, driven by Deborah Renshaw, came around the turn going at least 160 mph and plowed into Martin's car on the driver's side.

The 33-year-old Martin died of massive internal injuries. Renshaw, 25, was taken to hospital in Charlotte, where she was in fair condition.

FOOTBALL

OWINGS MILLS, Md. (AP) – For the first time since 1998, the Baltimore Ravens are preparing to play a game without middle linebacker Ray Lewis.

He missed practice with a sore shoulder and is listed as doubtful for Sunday's game against Indianapolis. The five-time Pro Bowl star has played in 63 straight games, but if there's a chance that Lewis could risk further injury on the turf in Indianapolis, the linebacker will miss his first start since Oct. 11, 1998.

LAKE FOREST, Ill. (AP) – Chicago Bears wide receiver David Terrell said he'll miss four to five weeks with a broken bone in his right foot. Terrell will have surgery Thursday.

GOLF

NEW YORK (AP) – Bethpage State Park, which hosted the U.S. Open in June, will have the tournament there again in 2009.

TENNIS

FILDERSTADT, Germany (AP) – Top-seeded Jennifer Capriati lost to qualifier Alexandra Stevenson 7-6 (3), 4-6, 6-4 in the Porsche Grand Prix second round.

The 35th-ranked Stevenson, who played three matches to reach the main draw, gambled on winners throughout and hit her second serve full strength to pressure Capriati.

HOCKEY

LOS ANGELES (AP) – Three years after hanging up his skates with 61 NHL records, the Los Angeles Kings retired Wayne Gretzky's silver-and-black No. 99 jersey in a ceremony that turned into a lovefest for the player credited with making hockey a success in North America's warm weather climates.

BASKETBALL

BEIJING (AP) – Center Wang Zhizhi has been kicked off China's basketball team for choosing to play with the NBA's Los Angeles Clippers instead of at the Asian Games.

Wang, who signed last week with the Clippers, has shown an "absence of professional standards, indiscipline and indifference to the interests of the nation," according to a statement by the China Basketball Association published in the Beijing Times and the Beijing Morning Post.

SEATTLE (AP) – Rashard Lewis, the Seattle SuperSonics' new $60 million man, won't need surgery on his sore left shoulder. After feeling something pop Sunday in a game, Lewis had an exam and other tests which showed no damage to ligaments, muscles or tendons.

Minutewomen enter eye of the Red Storm

By Nick Wright
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

The Massachusetts women's tennis team will play its last competitive dual match of the year when it faces St. John's in Jamaica, N.Y. on Saturday. It is also the last match for UMass before the ITA Regional Championships commence on Oct. 25.

The Minutewomen are hoping to beat the Red Storm for the second time in just over six months. A repeat of the 4-3 victory the Maroon and White secured in April 2002 would be a welcome confidence boost with the ITA's just around the corner.

In April's match, sophomore Stephanie Price and junior Susan Hyams won crucial single points to guide UMass to victory. Their contribution along with that of sophomore Sasha Edelstein will no doubt prove crucial in determining the outcome of the match this time around.

Alarmingly, though, for the Maroon and White, number two singles Price has suffered a dip in form since winning the Dinn Brothers/UMass Athlete of the Week award, in recognition of winning the number two singles flight at the Eastern Collegiate Women's Tennis Championships.

Meanwhile, number one singles Edelstein has seen little court time due to the combination of an untimely back injury and the poor weather conditions.

It has been left to team captain Hyams to lead by example and she has not disappointed. Not only did she, along with Dorothy Iwanowicz, win the second flight of doubles at the Yale Tournament, but she has also won her last two singles and doubles matches in the dual match format during the narrow 5-4 victory over Amherst College and 5-2 defeat against Connecticut.

The Minutewomen will need to be on top of their game, though, if they want to secure a repeat of their victory back in April. The Red Storm has been impressive in winning the two dual matches it has played so far – both of which were on the road.

First, on Sept. 28, St. John's swept Fairfield 7-0, winning all three doubles as well as the six singles matches in an impressive opening victory. In particularly impressive form was sophomore Kristina Bothova, who breezed through her number two singles match (6-0, 6-0) which sets up an intriguing encounter against the Maroon and White's Price. Also impressive in the number four position was freshman Lauren Lorenzetti, who won her match 6-1, 6-1.

On Oct. 5, St. John's competed in a tri-match against Fordham and host school Hofstra. In its opening match against Fordham, it was given a much tougher test than it had faced against Fairfield. The Red Storm had to come from behind after losing the doubles point but took four of the six singles points on offer to run out 4-3 winners in the end.

Again, Bothova and Lorenzetti were both impressive for St John's, winning their singles matches along with number one single Nataliya Kustova. The game was evenly poised at 3-3 going into the final singles game and graduate student Vera Efstathiou won in three sets to secure the point that gave the Red Storm a victory by the closest of margins.

Their second game of the day against Hofstra was called due to bad light. However, by the time it was called St. John's had already amassed an unassailable 4-0 lead.

The match certainly looks to be one that could go either way with the result likely to be determined by a combination of who wins the crucial points, who has the most will to win and as always, a little bit of luck at the right time.

Absent stars Guerin, McLaren, Dafoe make Bruins chances dim

By Jimmy Golen
ASSOCIATED PRESS

BOSTON (AP) – Once again, the Boston Bruins open the season talking about the players who aren't around.

Bill Guerin, the NHL's No. 2 goal-scorer last year, left for a $45 million contract with the Dallas Stars. Goaltender Byron Dafoe is an unrestricted free agent unwilling to return to the Bruins, and not drawing much interest, either in Boston or elsewhere. Defenseman Kyle McLaren is also sitting out, though as a restricted free agent he can't go anywhere unless the Bruins grant his trade request.

Put it all together – or, rather, take it all apart – and it's hard to figure that the Bruins can repeat their surprising regular-season run that landed them atop the Eastern Conference standings last year before they made a quick exit in the first round of the playoffs.

The Bruins open their season Friday night in Minnesota.

"It's tough not to have those guys around, but this is what we've got in our room. This is what we've got to work with," said newly minted captain Joe Thornton, the team's biggest remaining star. "We had a great year last year except for the playoffs. But that's the way the business goes."

That's the way it's gone for the Bruins for a while, anyway.

Jason Allison was traded last October after asking for a big raise a year after he finished fourth in the league in goals. In 2000, it was Sergei Samsonov, Anson Carter and Thornton holding out – the team's top three scorers from the year before; plus, it was the team's first camp in two decades without Ray Bourque, who had asked to be traded to a contender the previous spring.

In 1999, it was Dafoe, P.J. Axelsson and Hal Gill. In '98: Allison, Carter, McLaren and Ted Donato.

This year, the Bruins hit for the cycle, losing – for now, at least – their best forward, defenseman and goalie from a year ago.

Guerin had 41 goals for Boston in the regular season and also led the team with six points in the playoffs. But the offer from the Stars was far more than the usually tightfisted Bruins have ever shelled out for a player.

McLaren grew under the tutelage of Ray Bourque into a stellar defenseman. But, like his mentor, he has asked to be traded, and he held out from training camp after the Bruins started negotiations with him by offering a two-way contract that cuts his salary if he gets sent to the minor leagues.

Dafoe posted a 35-23-6 record and 2.21 goals-against average in the regular season. But he went 2-4 with a 3.18 GAA in the playoffs as the Bruins lost in the first round to Montreal; with both sides still bitter about Dafoe's 1999 holdout, there was little chance he would return.

The people who are back for the Bruins should be good enough to keep them from missing the playoffs for the third time in four years.

With a first line of Thornton, Samsonov and Glen Murray, who had a career-high 41 goals last year, the offense could survive Guerin's absence. Defenseman Bryan Berard signed as a free agent to bolster a young corps that could get better with experience.

But that still leaves two largely untested goalies taking Dafoe's place while he waits for an offer good enough to get him back onto the ice: Steve Shields, the former University of Michigan star and most recently a backup in Anaheim, and the longtime Bruins minor leaguer John Grahame.

"My play is going to dictate what's going to happen, so I just try and focus on that," Grahame said of what could be a lengthy, in-season competition. "Obviously we didn't finish where we wanted to last year and we've got some things to learn. But I think you have to go in with the confidence that you did do well last year. Go out and prove why you were No. 1 in the Eastern Conference."

A long, winding road

By Andrew Merritt
COLLEGIAN STAFF

There are three battles taking place on the road for the Massachusetts men's soccer team this weekend.

No, they didn't tack an extra few hundred miles onto their trip to play an impromptu contest in Syracuse, or Olean, or any other outpost in the Northeast. Rather, they'll square off with three scheduled opponents: Fordham, La Salle and the road.

The Minutemen (6-4-0, 2-0-0 A-10) will travel 518 miles over the next four days, just over half of what The Proclaimers deemed good enough for the absolution of love.

The Maroon and White's mission, however, is much different. It's looking to extend its four-game winning streak, and stay undefeated in the Atlantic 10. Of course, the distance they'll be traveling is daunting, and should be a good test of the team's resiliency.

"It's kinda hard on the legs going down there and getting out of the van," senior Derek Rhodes said. "But we'll get down there early enough that we can usually get a practice in, get our legs underneath us."

Today, the Minutemen square off against La Salle (4-5-1, 2-0-0 Atlantic 10) in Philadelphia. The Explorers are on a hot streak of their own, coming off their third straight win, a 2-1 victory over Temple.

Junior Bob Biancristiano leads a talented Explorer squad with four goals and two assists in 10 games. Freshman Scott Golden is just behind Biancristiano with two goals and four helpers. Sophomore goalkeeper Stash Graham has posted a 1.22 goals against average and an .862 save percentage.

"They're a hardworking team," UMass Head Coach Sam Koch said. "They've got a couple of guys in the back that are hard workers. Their goalkeeper [Graham] is very good, he's got a long punt, so he could put us under pressure just with his goal punt and his drop kicks – he can hit a ball 80 yards."

While UMass may have become used to the excellent home pitch at Rudd Field, La Salle's house, McCarthy Stadium, will be a bit less welcoming.

"Down in Philadelphia," Rhodes said, "the field isn't as nice as Rudd Field, so it's a pretty big advantage for La Salle. It's smaller, bumpier, they have home refs, and the fans are pretty rowdy too. Hopefully we can overcome that."

The Minutemen follow up with a match against Fordham (4-5-0, 1-1-0 A-10) on Sunday, scheduled for 1 p.m. The Rams are also riding high off of a stunning overtime win over St. Joseph's last Sunday. After trailing by three goals for nearly the entire first half, Fordham chipped away at the deficit in the second, and tied the game at three with under four minutes remaining. They took the contest on a goal from junior Ryan Bonura just four minutes into overtime, his third tally of the game.

The Rams also dropped a 2-1 decision to Temple last Friday to put them at .500 in the Atlantic 10.

With 15 freshmen and sophomores on the roster, Fordham is a young team showing serious potential for Atlantic 10 greatness, headlined by the efforts of senior Brian Borrhello, who has 10 goals and two assists in eight games, as well as Bonura, who has tallied three goals and a helper in nine matches.

Not that the Minutemen have slouched in the Atlantic 10, either. They traveled to the tri-state area just six days after their most inspired effort of the season. Last Sunday, senior Jeff Deren scored four goals en route to a 5-2 victory for the Maroon and White over Dayton. For his efforts, Deren was named the College Soccer News National Player of the Week, as well as the Atlantic 10 Co-Player of the Week.

With the spectacular win, the Minutemen are the most confident they've been since their opening 4-3 win over Rutgers. And while they may see decreased time from sophomore Martin Burwell, who ended his practice early on Wednesday after complaining of illness, they have shown offensive firepower and overall consistency that makes them a certain contender for the A-10 title.

Jason Souldmore and the men's soccer team will travel more than 500 miles this weekend to play at Fordham and La Salle.

A turning point for the Minutewomen

By Bob McGovern
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

At first glance it would seem that the Massachusetts women's soccer team (2-7, 1-2 Atlantic 10) has already let their season slip away. A season filled with losses and letdowns that would have seemingly left any team with its head hanging and spirits low.

This is only at first glance. Aside from a losing record, the level of play that the Minutewomen have exhibited lately has dramatically changed for the better. Beating conference foe Xavier and playing down to the last minutes with Dayton has shown that not only can UMass compete in the A-10, but victories may be soon to follow.

This weekend may prove to be the biggest test for the Maroon and White as it takes on fellow A-10 members LaSalle (5-4-1, 2-1 A-10) and Fordham (5-6, 1-2 A-10) in the comfort of Rudd Field.

"They are not giving up...this team is showing a lot of good signs," Coach Jim Rudy said about his team's recent play. UMass defeated both teams last year in close fashion, but that was a more experienced side. Rudy believes that even with his youthful squad, this weekend should prove to be successful.

LaSalle has put together one of its better sides and is sporting a cast of veterans that have raised eyebrows among the ranks of D-I soccer. After being upset by Temple, LaSalle is looking to rebound against the Minutewomen and continue its journey towards the A-10 Tournament. They have in their weaponry the 2001 A-10 Offensive Player of the Year, Amy Snyder, whom the Maroon and White are looking to neutralize.

"They have played a strong schedule and have a very mature team," said Rudy about the Explorers season. Adding to this maturity are four returning defensive players and three midfielders who are also familiar with the ranks of D-I soccer.

Fordham looks to be more of a question mark for the Minutewomen as they have gone through a total of 21 personnel changes. One thing that is for certain is that Fordham wins the size game.

"They are a huge squad, they have sixteen players that are 5-foot-7 or taller," Rudy said about the much larger Fordham squad. The Maroon and White only has three players near or at the 5-foot-7 mark. So far Fordham has put together a better team than has been seen in the past. Most of their success has rested on the shoulders of top goal scorer Kirsten Gellatley and teammate Jackie Aines. The Minutewomen appear to have a slight edge in speed, but will need to find a way to overcome the size differential.

"It is hard to tell what they are going to do... one scouting report says one thing then they change everything up," Rudy said.

The Minutewomen will be looking towards their newly energized defense which has been holding strong recently with goalie Kelly Nigh coming into her own and posting some strong saves under pressure. Keeping the ball away from Kelley are defensive players Alexi Rudd, Erin Muir, and Tiffany Hamill whom Rudy gives credit to for standing as a strong defensive unit as of recent. With devoted youth and a new outlook on the season the Maroon and White will be coming into this weekend swinging.

This weekend will also give the Maroon and White a chance to play at home again, which will be helpful, as Rudy believes Rudd field gives his team a good advantage. "We know how to play on it," said Rudy, "We have played on small fields, fields with bad grass, and fields with long grass...it's nice to play at home."

This advantage will add to the already energized Minutewoman team as they continue down the road towards the A-10 Tournament. After this weekend UMass plays two more away games before they have straight home games up until the tournament.

The second season is underway and it seems that a new team is in Amherst, a team that means business.

Role change for field hockey

UM becomes hunted in conference play

By Glen Straub
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts field hockey team (0-12 overall, 0-0 Atlantic 10) is about to take a magic carpet ride to a whole new world. It is the world of A-10 field hockey.

In this whole new world, the top teams in the nation are not dominating the Minutewomen by scores of 8-0 and UMass is not carrying a disgraceful double-digit losing record.

In this whole new world – the world of the A-10 – Massachusetts is the defending conference champions heading into a fresh start with a 0-0 mark. UMass is the one squad that every other team in the conference is chasing.

In this whole new world, there is a fresh new attitude amongst the Minutewomen because tonight at 7 p.m., UMass plays its first conference affair against the Richmond Spiders (6-6 overall, 0-0 A-10) under the lights at Richard F. Garber Field.

GERALD H. LINCO/COLLEGIAN

Sarah Bohonowitz and the field hockey team are off to the worst start in team history. The beginning of the A-10 schedule will ease their strength of schedule and likely lead to win number one.

Following a 3-1 defeat to Providence Wednesday, the Minutewomen increased their season-opening losing streak to 12 – by far the worst start in UMass field hockey history.

Head Coach Patty Shea has linked the poor play to a lack of aggression and, as ironic as it sounds, the players' fear of making mistakes.

"We refuse to do the things that make us successful as a team," Shea said after a 1-0 loss to No. 19 Syracuse last Friday. "It's a simple game and we don't make it simple for ourselves.

"If you don't go to the ball, you cannot score goals," she added.

The young and inexperienced Minutewomen have shown signs of their nerves and passiveness getting the best of them in the contests. Their youth may not be much of a factor in conference play though.

This season, the A-10 teams will bring a lower class of competition for the Minutewomen compared to the squads that they have had to play so far, as they have played seven teams in the STX/NFHCA Top 20 rankings.

The 0-12 UMass record does not look so bad in the A-10 world, though. Rhode Island has started in a similar fashion at 0-11 and only one conference foe has a winning overall record – St. Joseph's is currently 5-4.

UMass has struggled immensely with its out-of-conference opponents and the transition into the conference schedule will lead to success according to co-captain Erika Whiston.

"When it comes to conference games, we will be doing just fine," she said.

Unlike the Minutewomen, the Richmond Spiders have survived their out-of-conference schedule. In only Head Coach Ange Bradley's second season of coaching the Spiders, she has led them to a 6-6 mark as they crawl into the A-10 portion of their schedule.

UR is powered by their stonewall defense. If you disregard a 6-0 loss at the hands of No. 16 Duke in Durham, N.C., the Spiders have let only eight goals enter their cage this season.

The unlikely leader of the defense is freshman goaltender Michelle Swartz. She has a .712 save percentage and she has allowed only 2.13 goals per game. The A-10 has paid close attention to her stellar play as she has been named A-10 Rookie of the Week twice this season. She received her second nod this week after she stopped Georgetown, 4-1, and Appalachian State, 2-0.

The discrepancies on the offensive side for the Maroon and White will surely be tested tonight against a rising star in the A-10. But as Shea has said all year long, the Minutewomen "must work on what we need to do, not what our opponents are trying to accomplish."

The University of Massachusetts and Amherst Police departments are working together on related unarmed robbery incidents that occurred on the night of Oct. 9.

According to UMPD, a student reported that he was assaulted and robbed at the PVTA bus stop on President's Drive at the Fine Arts Center. The student was waiting for the bus between 8:45 and 9:00 p.m. where four men confronted him and took his backpack.

One of the men struck him in the face with his fist. Most of the property in the backpack was recovered. The student was treated for his injuries and released from Cooley Dickinson Hospital in Northampton.

Less than a half hour before, at 8:28 p.m., Amherst Police reported a similar robbery in the center of town. According to Sgt. Ronald Young of the Amherst Police Department, four men with matching descriptions as the assailants in the UMass attacked a 66-year-old woman outside the Unitarian Church in Amherst center, knocking her down and stealing her purse.

"She's doing fine now," Young said. "There were some cuts to her face and they knocked her down."

"The suspect information is similar and we are in fact working together with UMass police on this case," he said.

The first suspect is described as a white male between 18 and 25 years of age. He's between 6 feet and 6 foot 3 inches tall approximately 165-170 pounds. He has scruffy, unkempt light colored hair and was wearing a hooded gray sweatshirt at the time of the incident.

The second suspect is white male between 18 and 25 years of age. He is between 5 foot 9 and 5 foot 11 inches tall with a medium build between 156 and 170 pounds. He has brown scruffy hair and was wearing a black hooded sweatshirt with a circle design on it on Oct. 9.

The third suspect is a possible white male between 18 and 25 years of age, and the fourth suspect is a black or Hispanic male with a pony tale, also between 18 and 25 years of age.

According to UMass authorities, composite sketches of suspects will be published as they become available.

Anyone with knowledge regarding this incident should contact the University Police Detectives at 545-0893. Anonymous tips can also be sent in two ways: phoned in at 577-TIPS or emailed through the anonymous witness page at www.umass.edu/umpd.

Bomb blast ravages Bali

Achmad Ibrahim/Associated Press

The chard ruins of a bomb blast in Denpasar, Bali, Indonesia, Sunday, Oct. 13, 2002, where a nightclub was destroyed late Saturday night, killing more than 180 people and injuring more than 300 others. A second bomb exploded about 100 meters (109 yards) from the U.S. consular office in Denpasar, the capital of Bali.

By Michael Casey

BALI, Indonesia (AP) – Indonesia's government, reeling from a bomb attack Saturday night that killed at least 180 people, acknowledged for the first time Monday that al-Qaida is active on its soil – setting the stage for a possible crackdown on extremists.

Stocks plummeted in the capital Jakarta, and markets sank elsewhere in Southeast Asia as tourists fled the country, already one of the region's most fragile economies.

But many Americans said they were planning to stay, contrary to State Department advice and despite warnings U.S. interests could be the next targets.

The car bomb Saturday at a nightclub packed with foreigners on this resort island is likely to harm more than just the economy and tourism. Since the Sept. 11 attacks, and despite U.S. pressure and the discovery of an al-Qaida-linked terror network in neighboring Singapore and Malaysia, Indonesia has insisted there is no threat of violent extremism on its soil.

The turnaround came after a Cabinet meeting in Jakarta Monday, when Defense Minister Matori Abdul Djalil said: "We are sure al-Qaida is here."

President Megawati Sukarnoputri is likely to face growing demands to arrest high-profile suspects whose continued freedom has astounded law enforcement officials in other countries. Whether she can do so without provoking extremists – and possible further attacks – is an open question.

Security Minister Bambang Susilo Yudoyono said there were signs terrorists were planning attacks against industrial sites, including ExxonMobil's Arun liquefied natural gas plant in Aceh and the Caltex refinery in Sumatra.

"We will increase the security alert in those areas," Yudoyono said.

On Bali, there was no visible evidence of a higher security presence or stricter controls at the airport, though police insisted an elite unit had been deployed.

The FBI and Australian detectives joined the hunt for the killers. Investigators from Scotland Yard were on the way, and Germany said it might send experts.

Bali police said 27 witnesses had been questioned.

Suspicion has fallen on Jemaah Islamiyah, a group that Singapore says is based in Indonesia and is linked to Osama bin Laden's terror network. But the group's leader denied involvement.

"All the allegations against me are groundless. I challenge them to prove anything," Abu Bakar Bashir said. "I suspect that the bombing was engineered by the United States and its allies to justify allegations that Indonesia is a base for terrorists."

Indonesia has refused to arrest Bashir, saying he has committed no crimes and that an anti-terrorism law has not been passed by Parliament.

Underlying the reluctance is a fear that arresting Bashir could provoke a backlash against the nascent democracy in the world's most populous Muslim nation, and that providing the military wider powers to deal with terrorism could herald a return of human rights abuses.

Malaysia and Singapore have jailed scores of suspected Jemaah Islamiyah members accused of plotting to bomb the U.S. Embassy and other Western targets. The group has carried out bombings in the Philippines.

Jemaah Islamiyah is believed to have four tons of ammonium nitrate, a chemical used to make the Oklahoma City truck bomb, purchased by a suspected Malaysian member who the Malaysian government says allowed two of the Sept. 11 hijackers to use his apartment in 2000.

The U.S. Embassy ordered all nonessential staff and dependents to leave Indonesia, and said other Americans in Indonesia should consider leaving. Up to 20,000 Americans are believed to be in Indonesia, although few are permanent residents. Many are employees of U.S. energy companies, which have extensive interests in the resource-rich nation.

Foreign countries compiled rising tolls of their citizens killed in the bombings, while volunteers at a hospital-turned-morgue piled ice on bodies and loaded others into refrigerated containers to slow decomposition in the tropical heat.

Australian Foreign Minister Alexander Downer, whose countrymen are believed to top the death list, arrived on Bali on Monday. The bombings may be the work of al-Qaida and its allies, he said, but he stopped short of calling for Bashir's arrest.

A pair of explosions, one from a car bomb, tore through a maze of bars, restaurants and nightclubs Saturday night at Kuta Beach, a haunt for surfers and young vacationers. The open-air Sari Club was turned into an inferno. Little remained of it Monday except a huge hole.

Government officials said 181 people died, although hospital workers put the total at 190. More than 300 people were injured.

Hundreds of wounded Australians were flown home Monday but two died en route.

Balinese officials said that only 39 positive identifications had been made – 15 Australians, eight Britons, five Singaporeans, six Indonesians, one German, one French citizen, one Dutch citizen, one New Zealander and one Ecuadorean.

Two Americans were killed and four injured, the U.S. State Department said. In London, the government said that at least 30 Britons died. Switzerland believed two of its citizens were among the dead.

Medals awarded to eight in ceremony

Chancellor John V. Lombardi conferred eight chancellor's medals during a ceremony on Friday.

"What we have here is a collection of extraordinary people," said Chancellor Lombardi in his opening remarks, "they're people who we'd like to recognize because they symbolize for us the kind of accomplishment that we want the institution to stand for and that we want our graduates to recognize."

This year's recipients were Ronald M. Ansin, Faith Gabelnick, Paul Kelliher, Charles Manley, Robert S. Peterkin, Paul Shuldiner, Baystate Medical Center, and Cooley Dickinson hospital.

The chancellor's medal is the highest honor given by the University of Massachusetts. Recipients are given the medal based on their personal accomplishments, professional or intellectual achievements as well as their contributions to the university and society as a whole. A committee is formed to review nominations each year and then they are submitted to the chancellor for the final decision.

Upon receiving the chancellor's medal, Ansin talked about how fulfilling it has been to have his two sons graduate from the University and to hear from students who have benefited from his pledges to help the study abroad program.

"These fellowships have been an exciting experience for me," said Ansin, "I get letters from them[students] about how they're doing overseas and it's really fun."

Ansin, is recognized as a businessman and as a philanthropist specifically in Central Massachusetts and supports various social, political, and educational efforts. In 1999, he received the Alexis de Tocqueville Society Award, the highest national award for community service given by the United Way. Ansin's multi-year pledge has helped students in the College of Social and Behavioral Sciences increase their study abroad opportunities.

Gabelnick, listed three "points of pride," which included her pride in being a UMass alumnus, in the Commonwealth College program and in learning communities. Gabelnick said she and her colleagues are working on another book based on learning communities and that part of her visit to UMass was to take a look at the Commonwealth College learning communities.

"We want to be able to mention the extraordinary work that is being done in various parts of this university to extend interdisciplinary residential education and civic education for our students," said Gabelnick.

Gabelnick is the president of Pacific University, which has been recognized among the Best Colleges and Best Values in 2002 by U.S. News and World Report. She has also held teaching positions at institutions such as American University and the University of Maryland. Gabelnick's work has focused on building and upholding learning communities, the studies of institution changes, as well as the role of women as leaders.

Kelliher, who is also an alumnus, said that it's easy to be motivated to give back to this university. As a student here about twenty-seven years ago, he said he was constantly supported and motivated by the faculty in the school of management. He said he thinks about their guidance in his life almost every day and is proud to see that tradition continuing to the present.

"I think the students of today's university also enjoy that same kind of support. And if I can do anything to continue and perpetuate that, that's really what my motivation is," said Kelliher.

Kelliher is a member of the Isenberg School's Business Advisory Council and Accounting Alumni Advisory Committee and was an active member and donor in their recent $26 million campaign for the school.Kelliher has been active in a number of different civic organizations throughout the area. He is a trustee at Our Lady of Elms College, an advisory board member of the Springfield Enterprise Center and is director of the Springfield Performing Arts Development Corporation. Kelliher is also a board member and past chairman of Business Friends of the Arts in Springfield, is vice chairman

ISOM dedicates new addition

The Harold Alfond Management Center, the new addition to the Isenberg School of Management (ISOM), was officially dedicated in a ceremony on Friday. Over 150 people attended the ceremony, which took place in the student center of the new addition.

"This is the building that we have built," said Dean Thomas O'Brien opening the ceremony.

Dean Thomas thanked all of the contributors in his remarks and emphasized how it took the entire community to build the building. Other speakers included Eugene M. Isenberg, Harold Alfond, SOM professor Dr. Mzamo Mangaliso, Chancellor John V. Lombardi and student speaker Christina Calvaneso. At the close of the ceremony, a fire alarm went off in the building but was shut off before people began evacuating. Hor d' oeuvres were served and students gave tours of the new building.

"It's kind of disappointing, I wish we had it when I was a freshman," said Ellen Asare a senior accounting major. The building has been open for classes since the beginning of the semester. Freshman, Brian Dugdale said he "came just at the right time."

"There's so many resources here that I never imagined were at my disposal," said Dugdale.

The three-floor addition has 47,000 square feet of space and cost $16 million to complete. It features four large lecture halls seating between 65 and 90 students, eight smaller rooms for group discussions and a large student center. The student center is situated under a 50-foot tall dome and is equipped with state of the art amenities for teleconferencing. It also features a computer lab to replace the smaller computer labs, and new offices for faculty and staff members.

Nathaniel Jewell, a sophomore SOM student said he just transferred to UMass from Bentley College. Jewell said he is more impressed with the new building and the offerings at SOM than while he was at Bentley.

"Academically, and facilities wise this is better than Bentley with the exception of the trade room," said Jewell.

Student, Patrick Hernon emphasized that the new building has freed up a lot of space in the old building for other activities such as a leadership room and the newly formed ISOM Honors Council.

"It's a gorgeous building they really did a hundred percent job. I'm very satisfied," said Alfond.

The construction of the center began in the spring of 2001. The funding for the building came from $12 million in private donations and $4 million from the university. Alfond, the chairman of Dexter Shoe Company in Dexter, Maine donated $1 million to the building fund and the Kresge Foundation gave $850,000 as a challenge grant.

"I was here three years ago, and at that time it was just a dream. Now it's real as day," said Alfond.

Shooting at store could be latest in serial sniper spree

By Matthew Barakat
ASSOCIATED PRESS

FALLS CHURCH, Va. (AP) - A woman was killed outside a Home Depot store Monday night, and police were trying to determine whether the shooting was related to the sniper spree responsible for eight deaths in the region in the past 12 days.

"A female has been shot and killed," said Fairfax County Police Lt. Amy Lubas. The woman was felled by a single shot at about 9:30 p.m., authorities. All the other deaths were also caused by one shot.

A police spokesman said roads were being closed in the area, about 10 miles west of Washington, D.C. The Maryland task force investigating the sniper attacks was conferring with Fairfax authorities to see if Monday's victim was the sniper's ninth.

Virginia State Police said they were on the lookout for a white Chevrolet Astro van, last seen traveling east on Route 50 from Falls Church. Interstates 66 and I-95 are nearby. Witnesses at some of the earlier shootings said a white van or truck left the scene.

The Home Depot is in the Seven Corners Shopping Center, a 430-thousand-square-foot strip shopping center with a parking garage. The center also has a grocery store, an electronics retailer and a pet supply retailer.

The body of the victim lay under a sheet is in the parking lot in front of the Home Depot, on the first floor of a two-story structure, 30 yards from the store entrance.

Kristin Reed, a supervisor at the Barnes & Noble bookstore in the sprawling strip mall, said six employees were locked inside the store with an FBI agent.

"Cops and cops and more cops," Reed said of the scene outside. "There's a lot of people walking around."

Reed said no one heard the shot inside her store. But "a customer had just walked outside, then came back in and said 'I think I heard a shot.'"

The federal agent in the bookstore "hasn't said anything to us. He was on the phone with someone," she said.

Four police squad cars rushed to a Silver Spring car dealership Monday after the window of a customer's BMW shattered when he closed the door. The man dialed 911, thinking a bullet broke the glass.

"He had no idea what happened – he was just freaked out," said David Earhardt, the dealership's service manager.

"People hear a noise, they're going to call _ they want to put an end to this just like we do," said Prince William County, Va., Detective Dennis Mangan, whose department brought in a helicopter to search the woods before determining a reported gunshot was just a car backfiring.

Authorities in Baltimore, meanwhile, seized a white van and found an assault rifle, sniper manual and ammunition similar to the .223 bullets used in attacks that have killed eight people and wounded two others, WBAL-TV reported.

MSNBC reported that a tarot card was found in the van and a sign on the dashboard read "Gihad in America." A tarot card was also found at one of the shootings.

The van's owner was being questioned by police Monday night.

"At this time, the task force believes this is not related to our sniper incidents," said Louise Marthens, a Montgomery County police spokeswoman.

Profilers say the long break could suggest the sniper is trying to outsmart police and change routine.

"Falling into a pattern is falling into a trap," said Robert K. Ressler, a former FBI profiler who helped investigators track killers such as Jeffrey Dahmer. "People this deep into aberrant behavior aren't just going to hang it up and call it quits. A week may go by now before they strike again, but I believe there are going to be more killings."

of Junior Achievement of Western Massachusetts, and is a director of the Economic Development Council of Pioneer Valley and Westmass Development Corporation.

Manley said true reward in his career has been to graduate from the University.

"My reward is the fact that I have been here at the university and participated," said Manley.

Manley has served as vice president for science and technology at Takasago International Corporation (USA) for the past 14 years. Manley is currently a member of the Industrial Board of Advisors to the Food and Science Department at UMass, Texas A&M, Institute of Food Science and Technology, at the Center for Advanced Food Technology at Rutgers University. Manley is a lecturer and has authored and edited many publications on flavor and flavor ingredient chemistry.

Peterkin, also talked about how his experiences at UMass and in life have helped him be an effective leader in public education. He said that the university has worked hard on many different areas to give equal opportunities to all students.

"They[the university] gave opportunities to women and people of color that other schools did not and now they're in positions of leadership throughout this nation," said Peterkin.

Peterkin is director of the Urban Superintendents Program and chair of programs in administration, planning and social policy at the Harvard Graduate School of Education. Peterkin's current work has focused on the restructuring of America's public schools with a concentration in teaching and learning. He has also been an expert witness in federal school desegregation cases and works on developing school programs for underprivileged children.

Shuldiner said that he is grateful the university has allowed him to use his skills in various capacities across campus.

"I've been encouraged to use what skills I have, regardless of designation, regardless of whether it's teaching, research or outreach, whether it was in engineering or in other parts of campus. And that kind of gift to an individual is not common I think, and I appreciate that deeply," said Shuldiner.

Shuldiner has been a faculty member in the Civil and Environmental Engineering department for over thirty years. He has served as the director of the UMass Transportation Center, which promoted research and outreach activities in transportation for the campus and the University system. He is also the director of the Baystate Roads Program. Shuldiner is currently doing environmental studies such as researching eroding storage tanks and researching the usage of recycled material in highway construction projects. He is currently developing a Regional Traveler Information System supported by the National Science Foundation and the Massachusetts Highway department to collect, interpret and distribute information to travelers, businesses and public agencies.

Smith said that the partnership between UMass and Bay State Medical center has been wonderful and has great potential in the future.

"Collectively, and actually with other hospitals and schools in the region I think we can really work on healthcare work force issues," said Smith.

Sharon Smith, the vice-president of patient care services at Bay State Medical Center accepted the chancellor's medal on behalf of Mark Tolosky, the president and CEO of Baystate Medical Center. Baystate Medical Center has also supported the school of nursing by funding full-time and part-time faculty members. The faculty has also provided support to the Baystate Medical Center's Nursing Staff Development Department by aiding in the revision of its orientation program and offering classes to prepare nurses in their role of mentoring new nurses. Prior to this partnership with the school of nursing, the medical center also helped to the Elizabeth Battey Marchese Memorial Scholarship, which supports students in baccalaureate nursing education. Most recently they provided 38 students with scholarship money totaling $170,000.

Chancellor John V. Lombardi awards a medal to Charles Manley, vice president for science and technology at Takasago International Corporation (USA) for the past 14 years. The medal is the highest honor that the University awards.

When receiving the medal, Melin said that the hospital has also greatly benefitted from the opportunity to work with UMass. Melin, is the president and CEO of Cooley Dickinson Hospital. Cooley Dickinson hospital has helped to fund full-time and part-time faculty members for the school of nursing. The partnership also allows for one faculty member to be a clinical educator to supervise and work with UMass students as well as develop relationships with middle school and high school counselors to develop nurse-mentoring programs.

"There are lots of opportunities to collaborate with UMass and if you just look for them and take advantage of them things can happen for the Commonwealth yourselves, as well as for the University," said Melin.

We can't change our lives over one incident

Twentieth Century Fox is strongly considering pushing back the debut date of its new sniper movie Phone Booth, because of the recent sniper shootings in Virginia, Maryland and Washington D.C.

Frankly, The Collegian disagrees.

The man responsible for these fatal shootings has allegedly left notes for the authorities claiming deity status.

And changing our lifestyle, even in a realm as trivial as entertainment, is bringing him closer to that goal.

Running scared is not the answer and as so many of our University peers have said in passing discussions, that's exactly what he wants.

This man, who is committing terrible injustices with no apparent motive wants us to run and be scared.

He wants to feel invincible, like he can't be caught, like he is feared, like he is above those who he considers his past, present or future victims.

Look back on the attacks of Sept. 11. In the aftermath, there was much discussion over how to act and feel and live.

Some argued we should move on and live life normally.

Some argued we should take a step back and others said we should find the medium solution.

Turns out the latter was correct. People lived differently after that day, but they still lived.

There will always be times to remember those who perished needlessly – like during the National Anthem, or on the anniversary of the attacks.

But most Americans know that the best way to honor the people that died is simply to live.

We are aware that it seems ludicrous and in some ways disrespectful to argue such a point with the support of a pushed movie opening and with Sept. 11 as a precedent, but that doesn't make our point incorrect.

Watch the next few weeks, if this sniper remains at-large, as things in our daily routines begin to change. And we're not talking about increased safety, because we are all for that.

We're talking about kids not going to school, adults skipping work, people not driving their cars – things of that sort.

We understand that safety and livelihood is a big concern and we also understand that it's easy for us to say this, being six states away from any conceivable danger.

Again we come back to the fact that it is only a movie and not something to go off the deep end about. But if the perpetrator is not captured in the next few weeks, watch how things change and be aware that that's exactly what he wants.

Capital punishment: a viable option

The Washington area sniper at large that has been claiming victims left and right is a sadistic animal. When he is finally apprehended, I don't think that there are many in this country that would argue with him being sentenced to the utmost sentencing possible, in all but 12 states in the country, that would be the death penalty. Consider however if his next victim is right here at home in Massachusetts. The hardest sentencing for even a killer of this magnitude is not the "eye for an eye" approach this situation deserves. Its life behind bars. That's not good enough.

LINDSEY ELDER

Although it can cost more to kill a person than to feed them for the rest of their lives in prison, pursuing a death sentence in appropriate cases is the right thing to do. There is no adequate and acceptable alternative in certain cases. Many in Massachusetts argue that life without parole is a reasonable alternative. However, it does not stop the prisoner from lashing out and killing a guard, a visitor, or another inmate. And, it is not entirely unheard of for an inmate to escape from jail.

Massachusetts held its last executions in 1947, though there have been numerous efforts to bring it back since the U.S. Supreme Court allowed its reinstatement in 1976. Massachusetts is one of only 12 states in the nation that does not enforce capital punishment. In 1997, a bill made it as far as the decision being in the hands of the House of Representatives, where it failed by a single vote. Even today efforts continue, as republican gubernatorial candidate Mitt Romney has stated that Massachusetts should reinstate the death penalty, separating himself from his opponents who all oppose it.

The way I see it, in American society today we too often consider the plaintiff's rights and well-being before we do the pain and suffering this person induced on his victims. Who cares about the accused when the accused is someone being brought up for charges of murdering a neighbor, a child or a complete stranger in cold blood? They had their chance and this was the road they chose.

Personally, the last thing I'm thinking about is what is going to be the fate of the person on trial. I always put myself in the place of the victim when I consider what should be the severity of the punishment. I consider how I would feel and what recourse I would want taken if the actual victim were my mother, or my best friend, my son or my daughter. When you consider things this way, the way you should, the furthest thing from your mind is whether or not this person is going to be receiving the proper counseling or therapy. All you want to know is that this deviant will never be a threat to you or anyone else again.

I don't think the death penalty should be the standard by any means, but it should at least be an option. I've always been a big believer of personal responsibility, people know the difference between right and wrong. Why are killers cut slack because they confess or because it was their first time committing murder? That byline should not even be a consideration because if you were ever charged before for murder, there should not be a chance in hell that you're back out on the streets again to even have the opportunity to do it a second time. This does happen however, due to certain flaws in the legislative systems in some states. A U.S. Justice Department study concluded last year that those sentenced to "life imprisonment" serve an average of eight years in prison - hardly suitable.

Groups against the death penalty always make a big deal about the mental capacity of the plaintiff. The Supreme Court ruled in June 2002 that the mentally retarded could no longer be considered candidates for the death penalty. Mentally retarded is one thing. I'm not arguing against those with a known, life long diagnosis of mental health problems. That is the gray area where therapy and containment are the proper recourse. However, am I the only one that thinks the plea "temporary insanity" is completely ridiculous? The only insane part of "temporary insanity" is the fact that in some cases it is an acceptable plea. You kill someone last week, but now that you've had some time to think about it, you realize you simply weren't yourself that night and now you want mercy? If you're not stable enough to know the evil and wrong in taking another human's life, then you're not worth remaining in society anyway.

There is a need in society for there to be a certain respect, and a healthy fear of the legal system for it to thrive. For centuries, the purpose of the death penalty has been to draw a clear, bright line between felony, robbery, or rape and felony murder. Rape or rob and you will get a long sentence in jail. But escalate the crime into murder and the punishment becomes an equal: You forfeit your own life.

In Saudi Arabia, as well as in other Middle Eastern countries, the penalty for theft is to have your hand cut off. In America, you can kill someone's entire family, confess to it, and still end up in a heated cell watching TV and lifting weights with three meals a day and a chance at a free education as your fate.

I fail to see any positive point in working with someone until he or she convinces you that they're sorry, or changed only to be given another chance at life when they took someone else's only chance. I can already foresee the letters to the editor adding up about the wrongfully charged minorities or that not everyone that's convicted is truly guilty. To knock out the possibility of one biased judge completely controlling the fate of others, the Supreme Court ruled that juries, not judges, must make the determination whether the convicted is to be executed or not. My argument is that in cases of first-degree murder where evidence is indisputable or the person willfully confesses, that capital punishment should be an option. Yes, mistakes happen, but with the increase in investigation methods and DNA technologies, when there is no question in a murder case, there should also be no question as to their fate.

Instant run-off voting as easy as 1-2-3

During the 2000 presidential election hundreds of thousands—if not millions—of people voted for Al Gore even though they supported the politics of Green party candidate Ralph Nader. Such voters fell victim to Democratic Party fear mongering. The argument went something like this: a vote for Nader was a vote for Bush. The Democrats argued that because Nader wasn't likely to win the election, he would be taking votes away from Gore, who would then lose to Bush. Sure enough, when Gore finally had the election stolen from him by Bush and his cronies, the Greens had hell to pay.

KEITH WRIGHT

It did not matter that Bush got more support from Democrats in Florida than Nader did. It did not matter that Gore abandoned a populist message at the urging of his conservative running mate. It did not matter that Gore was so far in the back pocket of the corporations that funded his election that he would have disappointed progressives the same way that Clinton did. Democrats were angry, and rather than accept responsibility for a lackluster candidate, they blamed the Greens. Ironically, the Greens, who are not beholden to the Democratic power elite or the corporations that keep them in power, would be much more able than Democrats to enact legislation that progressives support, including universal health care, publicly funded elections, and just tax policies, yet thousands of people abandoned the Greens in 2000, voting out of fear for the lackluster Gore.

As Massachusetts heads into the home stretch of the 2002 gubernatorial race, the same scenario could play out again. This time, the bogeyman is the Republican candidate Mitt Romney, and the only way to stop him, according to the Democrats, is—you guessed it—the Democratic nominee, Shannon O'Brien. In the Democrats we trust? Has anyone at this university seen a pay raise lately? The Democrats, who control 85 percent of the state legislature, balanced the budget on the backs of state workers and the poor. Green Party gubernatorial candidate Jill Stein is the only progressive candidate in the race. However, despite her progressive platform (www.jillwill.org), some progressives will be afraid to vote their conscience. Instead, they will go to the polls in November, hold their noses, and vote for O'Brien out of fear of another Republican administration.

It doesn't have to be this way. Recent legislation filed by Amherst State Representative Ellen Story would change the way we vote. The system is called Instant Runoff Voting, or IRV. Voters in the first and third Hampshire House districts will have a chance to vote for this concept in a referendum question on November's ballot. Here's how it works. Supposing there were three candidates on the ballot for a single office. Under IRV a voter could rank these candidates in order of preference. If no candidate received a majority of votes, then the lowest vote-getter would be eliminated, and people who voted for that candidate would have their vote reassigned to their second choice. This effectively eliminates the spoiler effect. People could vote their conscience without having to worry that they were wasting their vote on a candidate that had no chance of winning, or that they were helping the candidate they did not want to get into office.

Imagine a voting process where there was no spoiler effect. For the Democrats, this would mean that they couldn't appeal to their traditional base with the same lame argument they used in the 2000 election, namely, "vote for us because the other party is worse." Instead, they would have to either take stands consistent with the views of progressive voters or lose their support at the polls. Of course, IRV would also help the Democrats. In the primary election for governor that was just held, no candidate got a majority of votes. In fact, under IRV Shannon O'Brien would probably not be the Democratic nominee because two other more progressive candidates—Warren Tolman and Robert Reich—received more votes collectively. Now Democrats are stuck with a candidate who is failing to inspire the grass roots of the party. Under IRV, no candidate would have gotten a majority on the first round, and so Tolman's votes would have gone to someone else. A candidate who received a simple majority of the votes would be stronger than one that did not.

So, if you mention that you are planning to vote Green this November, and a Democrat starts wildly gesticulating and talking about the lesser of two evils, tell him or her you've had enough of the lesser of two evils. If Democrats are so concerned about the spoiler effect, then they should support instant runoff voting, because as long as they fail to fight for social justice, democracy, and the environment, the Greens will be a factor.

Defeating the fear

Eight years ago this month, I experienced it on a small scale. I remember the fear. I remember the confusion.

And while my memories of the week before Halloween in [illegible] grade aren't horrific or violent, what's going on in the D.C. area right now is still unsettling. And it's something that my child should ever have to worry about or understand in their innocence.

Back in seventh grade, I went to a small Catholic school not far from my home. It was small. It was home. There were no concerns in my life. We weren't about safety, security, or meltdown with guns.

Until one day.

I remember it breaking on the TV news and not quite understanding what it meant. Gang initiations? People looking for someone to take out for no other reason than sport? Why can't I go out and play football at recess?

At the tender age of 13, I along with the rest of my neighborhood got hit with a serious dose of reality. Gang activity was pretty heavy in the hood back then – as many as five street gangs called the area home.

When the news broke on the local TV station that gang initiation was the week of Halloween, rumors flew.

I'm still not sure what to believe. I don't know how much of it was fact and how much of it was fiction. The rumors were pretty scary though. Kids in my neighborhood were flat out warned: watch your back, it could be you. Rumor had it that the gangs were in competition and that initiations for new members might include the shooting of random kids for sport. New members do whatever they're told to do to get in. We all knew that.

I don't know why, but it never really quite clicked for me. As a seventh grader, it just hurt. It didn't seem fair that this wouldn't let me outside onto the playground for an entire week. It didn't seem fair that no one trick-or-treated in the neighborhood that year. It didn't seem fair that we didn't get to be kids anymore.

And this is why I feel so deeply for the children of Maryland and Washington, D.C. It just isn't fair. The killing of eight people and the wounding of two in the past week or so should never be trivialized – it puts the situation light years ahead of mine in terms of seriousness. But the violence itself is the tip of the iceberg in terms of what it has the power to do to the area's children.

A child was gunned down in cold blood. Randomly. Without feeling. And it could have been any of them. This is what the children of Prince County and the surrounding communities are dealing with.

The 13-year-old boy lost parts of his stomach and pancreas and all of his spleen. After surgery, a ventilator kept him alive for days. Where did it come from? Why?

In the spring of seventh grade, my school made the decision to spend thousands of dollars surrounding the school's grounds with a large chain link fence. I remember resenting the loss of freedom that it seemed to present. I remember being angry that things in the world beyond my control were caging me in. I hated that fence for all that I was worth. The idea that I needed intervention to keep me safe was infuriating.

D.C.-area people are victims in the same way now. They suffer from their own fears, fears that someone else created with malice. And the fears are totally justified.

The sad thing is that it changes lives. No one deserves that. It's one of the most confusing, frustrating, unsure, and divisive things ever. Everyone responds differently to the fears and no one way seems to be the right way.

Short of catching the killer, there are no answers. And as much as the deaths themselves, that is the tragedy. Sicko with the gun knows this. It's what he's preying on.

The children deserve their childhoods back. They deserve to be playing football and hopscotch and tag and running behind each other to pull one another's hair. They deserve their recesses. As much as anything else, that's America.

The fear can't win.

Letter to the Editor:

To the Editor:

I am writing in response to Jamie Loo's October 10th column. I have lived in Montgomery County most of my life. Last week, I was in the library between classes. I got an e-mail from my mother asking if I had heard about what happened the night before. My heart sunk to the floor when I read about the shootings, as it is when you first hear of a terrible something that you don't fully understand. That terrible something was attacking my community, and there was nothing I could do to stop it.

My father joked that when I come home this weekend, I should wear a bulletproof vest so "nobody will get me as I pull into the driveway." I laughed, but with hesitation. Obviously there is nothing funny about this situation, the situation of cab drivers and shoppers and middle schoolers being shut down as they went about their day. This is a situation my community has never seen before. The first day of the shootings, my sister's high school was put in "code blue" lockdown. No one could leave the building, and no one was told why. Parents were frantic, and teachers had to explain to kindergarteners why they couldn't go outside for recess. My sister arrived home that afternoon without knowing what had happened.

In Loo's article, she stated, "It's possible this could have been prevented." How exactly, could this have "been prevented?" Well, sure, we could all stay inside all our lives, never going to work or school or church. Then the sniper, as the killer is referred to, would have no one to hit, and we would be safe, right? Could we have stopped the sniper himself? Sure, we can arrest everyone in the DC metro area who owns a rifle and a white truck, in hopes of catching this person. There is clearly no easy solution to this. The killer has to be psychologically disturbed, and I doubt he would listen to the advice of anyone close to him, if there were such a person.

This situation, of innocent people from all walks of life being murdered, is very much unlike a string of high school gang wars, or the issue of a middle-aged man wandering through student's dorm rooms. All are serious, but the first does not compare to the others.

For the record, the citizens of Montgomery County, at least the ones I know, are not hiding in fear. Sure, everyone is scared, but kids are going to school, parents are going to work, and the high school football game will still occur. All of us who live in Montgomery County know what a great place it is.

The recent events are tragic, and have invoked a huge sense of loss in all of us. But we are not sitting inside in fear. The killer would enjoy that too much, I think. While I can't speak for everyone, I will go home this weekend not with fear, but with hope and faith in my community.

THE RULES OF ATTRACTION
Directed by Roger Avary
Starring James Van Der Beek, Shannyn Sossamon and Ian Somerhalder
Playing at Showcase Cinemas 1-15, West Springfield

There's not one character to connect to in the college comedy The Rules of Attraction, which has the effect of stranding the audience – and it strands the movie too. It's an adaptation of the novel by Bret Easton Ellis, the prankster-provocateur author whose most salient quality, to some, is that his novels are more notorious than good. The Rules of Attraction has been described by many as being dark. Well, it certainly is dark – it just isn't incisive or provocative or incendiary or any of the dozen other things it wants to be.

The movie is a depressing, two-hour wallow in a new kind of indie-brat misery; let's call it nihilism chic. The characters are creeps, hypocrites, blowhards, sleazebags, idiots, drunks, whores, morons and jackasses. They're the kind of unpleasant characters that make it all the more pleasant to be around the loser-stars of MTV's nightly hormonal bacchanals – think of the nude-is-as-rude-does fembot-sluts and meathead jocks that

White Oleander

WHITE OLEANDER
Directed by Peter Kosminsky
Starring Alison Lohman, Robin Wright Penn, Michelle Pfeiffer and Renée Zellweger
Playing at Cinemark 10, Hadley

Based on the best selling novel by Janet Fitch, White Oleander made it to the box office this past week. Directed by Peter Kosminsky, this movie made a lasting impression. Witnessing her mother kill her boyfriend for leaving her for another women, Astrid (Alison Lohman) is transferred from one Los Angeles foster home to another. She transforms into many different roles the families distill on her, while still holding on to what her mother (Michelle Pfeiffer) taught her all her life. Each role seeming to hurt her more than the one before, until she comes upon Claire (Renee Zellweger), a loving foster mother who shows her a different perspective on life that never seemed possible to Astrid before. As in many parts of this movie, this relationship did not last and more torment would come upon Astrid on her road to self-discovery.

The one word that came to my mind after seeing this movie was, disturbing. It wasn't sensational, nor terrible, but it was disturbing. Every time something bad happened to the main character, I was sure: "That's it; this is the part when she starts to pull her life together." A second after that thought crossed my mind, some other misfortune would occur.

White Oleander proved so difficult to watch because, in part, its story seemed so unrealistic and, in part, it reminded me that this situation has happened to a great number of people. Maybe not in the same way or sequence as it happened to Astrid, but with the same idea. No matter who you are or what you have gone through in life, something in this movie will hit close to home – whether it's your relationship with your mother, the hard time you had during your teen years or losing someone you looked up to or the someone you thought knew everything.

And such situations of losing someone so close, whether it's by death or coming to the realization that this person is not always right, bring with them a realization that one needs to find someone new to strive to be like. And what if

THE TUXEDO
Directed by Kevin Donovan
Starring Jackie Chan and Jennifer Love Hewitt
Playing at Showcase Cinemas 1-15, West Springfield

The Tuxedo opens with a sequence that has nothing to do with the rest of the movie. A deer strides up to a babbling brook as pristine as anything you'd ever see in an Irish Springs commercial and takes a drink from the crystal waters. We then get a nice, long close-up of the animal urinating into the water.

It goes downhill from there. The Tuxedo is nothing but a galumphing fiasco. Threadbare and tired, the movie stars Jackie Chan,

Commercial music prices on the rise

Will record labels reduce CD costs to appease the public?

After months of declining CD sales, some labels are finally offering new releases at discounted prices to get consumers to spend money on music, rather than pirating it.

A longtime and well-regarded American artist or band will usually have a release price at the standard $18.98 list price. A newer, younger act that a label is hoping to break will usually list for $12.98. Older fans of the veterans, label bigwigs surmise, will pay extra, while teen fans of a new act will only be able and willing to shell out so many dollars.

Sounding Off with Nick Markantonatos

But even acts that have been around for a few years can command album prices of $18.98. Christina Aguilera's sophomore effort Stripped, for example, off RCA will be priced at $18.98 when it hits stores on Oct. 29. Indeed, list prices extend from $18.98 down to $12.98 depending on the musician and record company.

But one offender has had the gall to go above the already ridiculous price tag of $18.98. The Universal conglomerate raised some of the prices on their releases by 99 cents to $19.97 (Eminem's The Eminem Show and Ja Rule's Pain is Love among them). With prices like these, sticker shock isn't out of the question.

For such relentless pricing, despite falling production costs, the business is paying its own hefty price. Record sales are plummeting faster than a skydiver without a parachute.

CD shipments dropped seven percent in the first six months of 2002, according to mid-2002 sales statistics released by The Recording Industry Association of America. Seizures of counterfeit CDs soared by 69.9 percent. The first-half decline in CD shipments comes on top of last year's overall 5.3 percent drop.

In all, total U.S. music shipments dropped 10.1 percent from 442.8 million units in the first half of 2001 to 398.1 billion in the first half of 2002. In dollar value, this represents a 6.7 percent decrease, from $5.93 billion in the first half of 2001 to $5.53 billion in the first half of 2002.

With consumer spending down due to a sluggish economy and high CD prices, is this really a big shock?

People are tired of shelling out nearly 20 bucks to find they only like a couple of songs on an album; no wonder they're downloading so much. Sales have dropped so drastically that to get into the top 10, an act only has to move 50,000 albums – about half of what it took in years past.

Music fans will be more willing to take a chance on a new artist if their music is priced reasonably. A low price reduces the risk of making a big mistake, which creates a heightened interest and a greater desire among people to want to try it out.

Executives appear to be learning, albeit slowly, from the statistics. In a desperate

Fifth time around near album failure for Gallagher brothers

OASIS
Heathen Chemistry
Epic

What can I say about Oasis that hasn't already been told before? Everyone knows that brothers Liam and Noel Gallagher are notoriously prickly toward each other. Everyone knows that Liam is a legendarily dissolute drinker and Noel is not afraid of shooting off his mouth, having blasted bands like System of a Down and the Gorillaz in the press. Their new album, Heathen Chemistry, shows signs of a band that has fallen victim to their internal turmoil. The album is dissolute, as Liam produces a bender, a weak and stringy Britpop dud that collapses under the neck-straining weight of rock 'n' roll ego.

Liam's vocals are strained and barely coherent throughout. He sounds as if he's partaking of his favorite activity during the recording. "The Hindu Times," the bleary and narcoleptic first single, kicks off the album on a low note. Liam's voice is nasally and stretched thin, backed up by unmelodic Brit-rock. The jangly harmony of "Force of Nature" sung in a petulant whine by Noel, falls flat on its face. Starting off with operatic piano, the bland ballad "Stop Crying Your Heart Out" suffers once again from Liam's strident screech.

"Songbird," sung by Liam but without the drunken bleating, is a sweetly crafted Beatles-esque pop song, but it hardly lives up to their great "Wonderwall." Oasis rarely succeeds on their fifth album. One of the times they do is on the Noel-sung "Little By Little." Noel's vocals are passionate and true, an antithesis to the arrogant tones on the other songs. And on the instrumental "A Quick Peep," the band gets into a good, strutting garage rock groove.

In the time since Oasis broke through, they have gone from ushering in a new wave of the British Invasion to a has-been rock group that have toppled under their own excesses and ego. They are never going to return to the top form that they were once in. They let themselves succumb to their own strife and squabbling, and the music has suffered. Heathen Chemistry is a train wreck with the lonely survivors trying to walk away before it gets too late.

Ethiopia dance troupe glides into Northampton

By Caitlin M. Ott
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

ESKESTA
Sage Hall, Smith College
Oct. 5

NORTHAMPTON – It was a rainy Wednesday night. And although outside the heavens were screaming in sadness, it was surely due to the fact that the five men and five women dancers of the Eskesta dance troupe were capturing all the joy the Earth had to offer. Flown in from the far shores of Mt. Carmel, Israel, each dancer is also a student at the University of Haifa. To reach their goals of preservation of their culture, to connect folklore and dance and to use their rich cultural heritage to create "an artistic dance based on movements which characterize the community," as the Eskesta Playbill phrased it, these dancers incorporated traditional movements with a spirit and style that was nothing less than a modern expression of dance.

Connected to the floor through their bare feet, in one of the first dances, an Ethiopian prayer held the roof up with the dancers clear immaculately harmonized song. Beginning with two males dressed in traditional flowing white pants and long sleeved white shirts, the atmosphere was set with their gut-wrenching cry. Soon accompanied by an unveiled woman dressed in a floor-length dress rimmed in red, close behind her are four veiled figures also wearing floor-length, all white dresses. With their hands planted softly besides their ears, these four women continually raised and dropped their hands to the sky and back to the Earth.

It is this dance that perhaps was one that held the saddest cultural relevance, for it was this series of movements that was much more than just a dance, explained Dr. Ruth Eshel, artistic director of performance, who related some of the cultural history associated the production: it was a prayer for all those lost escaping the persecution by the Ethiopian government. Until the 18th century, the Ethiopian Jewish culture was almost completely unknown to the rest of the world. Upon discovery, it was debated for nearly 100 years whether or not they were indeed Jewish. It was not until the 80s that the world collectively agreed they were Jewish. It was around this time, in 1977, that Israel recognized the threat posed to Ethiopian Jews under their current government. Enacting a plan of liberation, "Operation Moses" was put into action. Until the mid-80s when the media exposed what was happening, thousands of Ethiopian Jews braved the 600 miles of the Sudan desert on foot to reach planes that would take them to Israel. It is estimated that 3,000 of those who fled did not survive.

The majority of the dancers emigrated from Ethiopia either through "Operation Moses" or similar underground methods. The wisdom that these dancers carry with them from those journeys is noticeable in the simple way they tilt their eyes in all directions when giving thanks for this life.

"Now there's a concept that works: if you price music lower, sales will increase."

attempt to get consumers to sample music by new musicians, labels are actually dropping prices for what may be the first time ever. Earlier this year, album by Norah Jones, John Mayer and N.E.R.D. were selling well with prices at or below $10. Unfortunately, some record labels use the price drop as a manipulative tactic. After Mayer's record went gold (sales of more than 500,000). Sony raised the price.

Nevertheless, the price-cutting strategy is working. Some credit the success of the Ashanti album to sale prices way below its $18.98 list for starting the trend. Following in the footsteps of reducing prices like Ashanti's self-titled debut, Sean "P. Diddy" Combs' P. Diddy and the Bad Boy Records Present: We Invented the Remix and Musiq's Juslisen also debuted atop the Billboard album charts. Now there's a concept that works: if you price music lower, sales will increase.

Another factor that may be influencing record companies is the rise of the DVDs, which have increased in sales in recent years as their prices have dropped. Not only could this be a retail blueprint for CDs, but labels are also looking at DVDs as competition for shoppers' entertainment dollars. With blockbuster movies for sale on DVD for $15.99 (which usually contain four hours of bonus footage), consumers will think twice before buying a CD for $20.

Maybe the industry will learn from this lesson, and prices will continue to drop. But the trend in cheap CDs, even if it's newborn, is still a small victory.

no one's there? This is what Astrid learns – that perhaps such a replacement could even be herself – that she could be proud of herself.

One part of this movie that came out right was the casting. Michelle Pfeiffer plays the part of Astrid's mother perfectly. You love her in the beginning, hate her in the middle and are confused about her in the end. She is mysterious in a way that you never know exactly what she is going to say and almost dread hearing. Renee Zelwger plays such lovable characters, and this movie is no exception. She will have you rooting for her from the first minute she comes onto the screen.

Alison Lohman, playing Astrid, had a very difficult role to fill. While the movie covers her 15th through 18th year, she has to play many stages in Astrid's life. In the beginning, it is not clear if Lohman fits the part. As the movie goes on, however, she appeals to the role. This idea may apply more to the women in the audience than to the men, as with the rest of the movie.

This dramatic chick-flick was different from any recent movies. It was one of those movies that leave you walking away with an eerie feeling, even though it wasn't a horror film. It was one of those movies that you rent, sit down on the couch to watch and about a quarter of the way through, you realize you don't want to watch it anymore but don't get up to turn it off. You sit there and watch it till the end. This isn't because you are too lazy to walk to the VCR to press stop or because you really like it; its because you want to see what happens to Astrid later in her life.

As each tragedy occurs in Astrid's life, the view is fooled into believing that one huge event will turn her life around and make everything all better, but then another tragedy occurs and then another. And you can't turn it off while everything is so messed up, for every movie ends with a happy ending; it's like a code or rule or something, isn't it? Isn't it? C+ (Warner Bros. Pictures; rated PG-13 for mature thematic elements concerning dysfunctional relationships, drug content, language, sexuality and violence; 109 min.)

■ Rules

appear on "The Real World" and "FM Nation." Worse, the characters are phonies, mindless message boards for one big hollow message about society's embrace of decadence. Within the first 10 minutes of The Rules of Attraction, a virginal drunk girl is vomited on while being date raped, and another proceeds to have sex with the entire campus football team. Yep, it's that kind of movie. The faint of heart who wander in (help all ye who enter looking for American Pie 3) will probably barnstorm the exits trying to escape. (Come to think of it, so may some of the heartier movie buffs in the audience.)

But the movie is less off-putting than it is tedious and tiresome. We are bounced from one college-student-behaving-badly sketch after another, and with each redundant bout of screwing, swearing and wretched excess, we realize that Rules is desperate to be naughty and rebellious and anarchic and little else. But what taboos are being shattered exactly? That college students are hormonally deranged? Weren't the tragedies of empty, meaningless sex, casual drug use and Dionysian ingestion of alcohol already made public 30 years ago? Is the sight of James Van Der Beek – none other than the wholesome Dawson Leary – picking his nose the only thing left? The Rules of Attraction is a sick joke of black comedy that forgets the joke.

The setting is Camden College, a Northeastern campus where the entire student body seems to forgo studying in favor of staying well-lubricated, like a giant pinball machine (the movie is as annoyingly loud as one), the characters all carom off three central characters: Van Der Beek's Sean Bateman, the campus' cruel but charismatic drug dealer; Lauren Hynde (Shannyn Sossamon), the virgin who was raped; and bisexual Paul Detton (Ian Somerhalder), the most "sympathetic" of all the characters, if only because he spends most of the movie moping around. Paul once dated Lauren, is now gay and has the hots for Sean. Sean is infatuated with Lauren (he mistakenly believes she is leaving him anonymous love letters), who is willing to date Sean, but is really in love with Victor (Kip Pardue), currently vacationing in Europe. Various loutish characters float in and out of the orbits of these three who claim to "love" one another. But to ascribe a genuine human emotion to these vapid, self-indulgent, self-pitying characters is to add too much complexity to the movie.

The Rules of Attraction is a satire, but not a very sharp one. It takes the bold stance and says that our universities are filled with nothing but hedonistic imbeciles unconcerned with anything except were the next ephemeral thrill – be in chemical or sexual – is coming from. Anyone who's been to a weekend party knows there is some drunken debauchery to be found (Mom and Dad, welcome to college), but Rules takes it to extremes. Everyone is manipulative, self-centered and predatory, and the parties are orgiastic displays that would put Hef to shame. Is this the point – is the movie supposed to be a stylized, offbeat joke? Maybe, but it lurches into self-parody every time into launches into a new form of youthful depravity – which it does every five minutes or so.

Roger Avary, the director, employs a litany of film school geek tricks (rewinding, fast-forward, split screen, multi-character narration) but he doesn't add much; the tricks, like the casual sex and unfettered hedonism, seem to exist to disguise the fact that there's nothing here, that the movie is devoid of an honest thematic point. Van Der Beek does a nice 180 to play the snaky Bateman, and I liked a couple of Avary's tricks (like Pardue's Eurovacation montage sped up to 70 seconds and the way flashbacks are used to tell a suicidal girl's story, which has more meaning than anything else in the film). But the film is nothing but an excuse: an excuse to see television sweethearts (Van Der Beek, Jessica Biel, Fred Savage) act badly and an excuse to rattle on for two hours about sex, drugs and druggy sex. Excuse me, but I can find a better party to spend two hours at. D (Lion's Gate; rated R for strong sexual content, drug use, language and violent images; 110 min.)

the Buster Keaton of martial arts, who's on-screen goodwill is put to the severest test possible. The movie is graceless and clod-footed, turning Chan's masterful, balletic physical comedy skills into a toxic embarrassment.

Chan plays Jimmy Tong, a completely un-suave New York cabbie, who's hired to be the driver for Clark Devlin (Jason Isaacs), a tycoon who is in reality a Bond-ish government secret agent. When Devlin is badly injured by a booby-trapped skateboard, Jimmy puts on the man's beloved tuxedo that happens to be a billion dollar government weapon that allows its wearer to perform a variety of talents, from fighting bad guys to dancing the mambo. In the tradition of all such movies, Tong is (unconvincingly) paired with government agent Del Blaine (Jennifer Love Hewitt, perky but not believable) on a mission to stop Banning (Ritchie Coster), a bottled water mogul who plans to poison the world's water supply with dehydrating bacteria so that everyone will buy his product.

Excuse me, but is there anything truly scary about a bottled water mogul – especially one as Eurotrash as Banning? He seems like the kind of guy who should be buying really bad art at an auction rather than trying to take over the world (especially with a plan so scientifically suspect as the one he uses). As a villain, he's about as frightening as a bottle of Evian, and he saps whatever urgency the movie may have had. It's a bad sign when the fate of the world is at stake, and the only thing you think of his your watch.

Chan, who is pushing 50, has started to pair up with younger costars. But Chan lacks chemistry with Hewitt; there's no spark the way there was with Chris Tucker and Owen Wilson. Chan's patented brand of hand-to-hand Kung fookery has been shunted aside for lame wire work that looks like a bad parody of The Matrix. Hewitt, meanwhile, should know by now that her good girl cheerleader effervescence hardly passes for a performance. (Though you never know – Hewitt acts as if she realizes her character is nothing more than a walking boob joke, yet she still gamely marches on.)

It's far too easy to punningly call The Tuxedo ill-fitting, shopworn, moth-eaten. But it's far too appropriate as well. The Tuxedo takes Jackie Chan, the Hong Kong jester, and turns him into a waxen pod person of himself. 1 (Dreamworks; rated PG-13 for action violence, sexual content and language; 99 min.)

Minutemen remain perfect in A-10

Fordham, LaSalle play next victims for UMass

By Mike Marzelli
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts men's soccer team is choosing the right time of year to click. This past weekend saw the defending Atlantic 10 Champions take their first road trip of the season since beginning conference play, and while the venues may have changed for the Minutemen, the results remain the same.

After answering critics' questions about key aspects of his team in resounding victories over Xavier and Dayton at home last weekend, Coach Sam Koch's squad again maintained its legitimacy as bona-fide league frontrunners with impressive back-to-back shutouts of La Salle and Fordham. The Minutemen are now 8-4-0 overall, but more importantly 4-0-0 in the Atlantic 10, their best league start since they began with the same mark in 1994.

"Both of these games were good wins," said Koch. "The playing conditions were not ideal, and both fields were tough to play on. We're certainly happy with the results."

With rain-soaked conditions slowing the pace of their Friday afternoon contest for the second week in a row, the Minutemen could manage only three first-half shots on Explorer keeper Stash Graham. However senior goalkeeper Enzo Altomare and the UMass defenders continued their trend of stepping up when they are needed most, as they held La Salle to a similarly inept total of four first-half shots. Altomare posted two saves in securing his third shutout in the last four games as he continues to try and secure himself as the number one keeper.

LaSalle	0

"Enzo is doing the job," said Koch. "He's posted two straight shutouts, but all of our keepers are talented. Both Dave Doucette and Colin Burns really push him and make him better."

The second half would see another trend pick up, as the Maroon and White attack came to the aid of its defensive mates and turned up the pressure on La Salle. The Minutemen would proceed to pepper the Explorer net with 13 second half shots, and at the 62:53 mark of the half they would finally cash in with the difference maker.

Senior captain Yuri Morales would receive a feed from fellow classmate and captain Jeff Deren and break through the Explorer defense to beat Graham to the top right corner of the net with the game-winner. It was Morales' fifth goal of the season, and more importantly it secured the fifth consecutive win for the Minutemen and a perfect 3-0-0 record in the A-10.

As UMass traveled to The Bronx, N.Y. in hopes of posting its sixth consecutive win as well as remaining perfect in conference play, a familiar face would step up to lead the Minutemen charge. Jeff Deren, College Soccer News and Atlantic 10 Player of the Week, would tally two goals, raising his team-leading total to 12, as the Maroon and White would record its second straight shutout, a 3-0 triumph over Fordham.

Deren wasted little time in getting back in the scoring groove after being kept out of the net against La Salle. He would post his 11th goal of the year off a perfect cross from junior Dan Colwell, which Deren headed in, putting UMass ahead to stay at the 5:53 mark. However, the duo was not done, as it would connect eight minutes later when Deren would post his 12th tally of the year off another beautiful Colwell feed, sliding a short shot past the diving Ram goalie and putting the Minutemen ahead 2-0.

"He's our best scoring threat," Koch said of Deren. "He means a lot to the team with all that he does, and not just on an individual or statistical basis. He's an all-around player."

With a comfortable two-goal lead, the defense would again tighten up, limiting the Rams to four first-half shots and nine overall. The combination of Altomare and Burns would combine to have to make only one save in recording the fourth UMass shutout in the last five games. With play being controlled on both sides of the ball by the Minutemen, junior Ptah Myers would cap off the Minuteman scoring at 16:15 of the first half off of a free kick from senior captain Derek Rhodes.

While posting a sixth consecutive victory and a second consecutive shutout attest to the fact that UMass is starting to come into its own in all aspects of play, the Maroon and White's conference record is more important, and it will return home this weekend in hopes of remaining perfect. For Deren, he hopes his torrid pace will continue, as his 12 goals and three assists on the season give him 89 points for his career, a mere seven points away from matching the all-time school scoring record of 96 points held by Mike Butler.

"We're just hoping to keep going like we're going," said Koch. "We're taking it one game at a time, we still have areas to improve on and that's what we'll concentrate on."

As UMass returns home looking to improve upon its best league start since the 1994 the year of the school's first regular season crown, Friday's contest will be a stiff test for Koch and his squad. Duquesne, also unbeknsited in the league at 3-0-1 and 8-1-3 overall, will visit Rudd Field for a 3:30 p.m. tilt. The Maroon and White will follow that up with another home contest, at 1 p.m. matchup again St. Bonaventure on Sunday.

Senior Yuri Morales' goal was the difference-maker in the Minutemen's 1-0 victory over LaSalle on Friday afternoon.

Senior Jeff Deren is now just seven points and two goals shy of tying UMass' all-time records in those categories.

Minutewomen win second in A-10

By Andrew Merritt and Mike Marzelli
COLLEGIAN STAFF

For the Massachusetts women's soccer team, 2002 looks to be a season of ups and downs.

That was apparent this weekend as UMass (3-8-0, 2-3-0 A-10) split a pair of games with conference foes La Salle (6-5-1, 2-3-0) and Fordham (5-8-0, 1-4-0). After dropping a grueling overtime decision to the Explorers, the Minutewomen bounced back and defeated the Rams 2-1.

UMass	2

Freshman Morgan Czaja netted the winning tally for the Minutewomen at 36:19 when she found a loose ball in the middle of a scramble in front of the Fordham net, and put it past junior goalkeeper Shannon Misiaszek. Czaja's goal gave the Minutewomen a 2-0 advantage.

The Maroon and White found itself in uncharted territory early in the match. Sophomore Erica Wideberg took a pass from junior Erin Lilly just 55 seconds into the game and put it home to give the Minutewomen the early 1-0 lead. It was the first time the Minutewomen had the first led since Sept. 22, a 6-2 loss to Auburn.

They would need the lead, as Fordham struck back just over two minutes later, when senior Kirstin Gellatly took a feed from junior Lauren Downey, and put it past junior keeper Kelly Nigh to cut the deficit in half.

The Minutewomen came back with a strong second half, and earned the victory on strong possession play and the work of Nigh, who added seven saves to her season total.

"We played well early and then went into a bit of a funk there, until we changed one or two things," Rudy said. "I think people who made impacts today, little Morgan Czaja, and I thought that Tiffany Hamill had a particularly good game today. And Martha [Conover] and Carly [Turman] did their usual dominating possession in the middle, and that was meaningful for us."

With a steady rain falling throughout the morning and afternoon, the conditions at Rudd Field called for Friday's contest between the Massachusetts women's soccer team and La Salle University to be a defensive-minded affair, and it was just that.

The Explorers' Amy Schneider tallied her 100th career point, beating UMass keeper Kelly Nigh to the upper left corner of the net at 4:46 of the second overtime, as La Salle came away with a hard-fought victory over the Maroon and White.

"I thought it was tough to lose the way we did," said Coach Jim Rudy. "[La Salle] is a tough team who is a lot older than we are, it was tough to lose with five minutes to go."

While neither team found the net until Schneider's goal, both teams had legitimate scoring chances in regulation and in both overtimes. UMass put together its best offensive chance at the 64-minute mark as senior Alexi Rudd lined up for a corner kick. Her lob in front of the net found the foot of junior teammate Erin Lilly, but Explorer keeper Marisa Suarez stopped her shot from inside the box and denied a rebound attempt by senior Martha Conover.

The Minutewomen saw their next scoring chance go by the boards midway through the second overtime as freshman Linday Bellini broke through the Explorer defense and rolled a shot on net that was kicked away by a La Salle defender at the goal line.

"We came close a few times both in regulation and in the overtime," said Rudy. "But we just couldn't finish one off. We played a really tough game."

The Explorers missed an excellent chance to secure the game at 7:50 of the first overtime as Krista Lee broke in alone on net, however Nigh made a superb effort to turn the shot away and keep the Minutewomen alive. Nigh withstood a steady barrage of offense from La Salle throughout the afternoon, 24 shots in all, in keeping UMass in the game. Her 10 saves equaled her season average, good for fourth in the nation. Her counterpart, Suarez, finished the day with six saves for the Explorers on 13 Minutewoman shots.

The Minutewomen hit the road next weekend for games against Duquesne and St. Bonaventure. Friday they will travel to Pittsburgh, Pa. for a matchup with the Dukes, and Sunday they move on to Olean, N.Y. for a 12 p.m. contest with the Bonnies.

Coach Jim Rudy and his team have improved their play since the conference season began last weekend. Two games on the road this coming weekend will test their resilience.

Maine, Maine go away

Weather muddles McGuirk

By Matt Brady
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Everything was in place for a showdown. Homecoming weekend. A brand-new park oriented toward the fans. The second-ranked Maine Black Bears, losers of 19 of their 23 all-time contests to the Minutemen, were poised for an old-fashioned battle on the gridiron.

And Mother Nature provided the punchline.

In Saturday's 20-10 Massachusetts victory, R.J. Cobbs had another solid game, Adrian Zullo was stellar at wide-out and the UMass defense turned in its third straight impressive effort.

But to anyone who attended the game, the weather was the story. Though officials kept the field at McGuirk Alumni Stadium covered until the morning of the contest, the rain-battered, recently-sodded surface could not hold up to the abuse of 60 minutes of football, and by the end of the game, the game looked more like a mud wrestling contest than a football game.

"I didn't know if we were mudders at all," UMass Head Coach Mark Whipple said. "It was really good to be back home. I'm not going to sit here and tell you I enjoyed the weather. It was so wet that a lot of things we wanted to do with our double moves, we couldn't. I don't like it. It's a pain in the ass."

In terms of affecting the game play, the results were obvious, as most players had far less speed and cutting ability as they normally would possess.

"It was kind of thick out there, but I just had to keep running, I guess," Cobbs said.

"[Maine and UMass] are both working against the same elements," Zullo said. "If anything, it slows me down a little bit."

But for both teams, fumbles were an obvious result, as Maine had balls hit the ground four times, UMass five. Each team saw one fumble go for a turnover. The Black Bears, however, seemed uncomfortable handling the snap all day long, as all four of their fumbles came as a result of mishandled snaps.

Still, neither coach was willing to credit the weather for having an effect on the result of the game.

"That would be an excuse and I'm not about that," Maine Coach Jack Cosgrove said. "They beat us fair and square."

"It's football. It doesn't really matter," Whipple said. "As a coach, you have to make some adjustments in your game plan."

That was obvious for the Minutemen, as the vaunted UMass passing attack, led by quarterback Jeff Krohn, attempted just 22 throws while the Maroon and White ran the ball from scrimmage 44 times. This was a far cry from its previous ratio of 161 passes to 143 runs in its first five games this season.

The Black Bears had no such luxury, as an early deficit put them behind the eight ball in terms of their game plan. Maine, primarily a running offense, attempted four fewer runs than it did passes in the contest, as the Minuteman defense stymied the Black Bears for just 108 yards on the ground, while they averaged just over 200 yards per game in its six wins this year, a total which put it just outside Division I-AA's top 20.

While Amherst native Marcus Williams averaged more than seven yards per carry, oft-scampering Maine QB Jake Eaton was held under one yard per run. Eaton too dismissed the weather as a reason for the Black Bears' first blemish.

"It's equal for everybody," Eaton said. "UMass' quarterback and wide receivers have to deal with the same thing. I actually thought it would help us, just because we're all from Maine and we play in the worst weather possible."

Minutemen send Bears home with first loss of season

By Jim Pignatiello
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Sweet home McGuirk Alumni.

After three straight weeks on the road that resulted in a 1-2 mark, the Massachusetts football team (4-2, 2-1 Atlantic 10) returned to Warren P. McGuirk Alumni Stadium Saturday. The Minutemen beat up on previously unbeaten No. 2 Maine (6-1, 4-1 A-10), 20-10, something they have done in 20 of their 24 all-time home meetings against the Black Bears.

Freshman running back R.J. Cobbs juked and jived past four tacklers on a 49-yard run on 3rd and 28, bringing the ball down to the one-yard line on UMass' first offensive drive of the day. Junior quarterback Jeff Krohn punched the ball into the endzone on a keeper to give the Minutemen a 7-3 lead, one they would never relinquish. The score was Krohn's first on the ground with the Maroon and White.

UMass	20
Maine	10

"I thought [Cobbs' run] was really good," UMass Head Coach Mark Whipple said. "That was a huge play. He made a great run down to the one."

Maine Head Coach Jack Cosgrove agreed.

"I thought that was a big play. We ran a blitz and they hit a seam," said Cosgrove, who pointed out that not only did the play get the team on the board, but also gave UMass the confidence that it could move the ball on a tough Maine defense.

In fact, the Maroon and White's first drive seemed to stall out before the Cobbs run, as tight end Eugene Sigmund jumped offside on 1st and 10, Cobbs lost a yard on 1st and 15, and Krohn was sacked on a rollout by sophomore Brandon McGowan for a 12-yard loss on 2nd and 16. No. 7 ran right into the cornerback blitz.

But the Cobbs run gave UMass the lead and took the momentum out of Maine's hands.

The Black Bears never got it back.

The Minutemen extended their lead to 13-3 when, on 3rd and 3 from the 16-yard line, Krohn faked the handoff to Cobbs and put enough touch to hit senior receiver Adrian Zullo on a fade in the endzone. Cobbs' previous success, including a nine-yard run on the play before, led to the success of the play action and the touchdown.

Cobbs ended the day with 112 yards on 18 carries. It was the third 100-yard rushing day in his first five career games.

UMass linebacker Jeremy Cain blocked a Maine field goal to keep the score at 13-3 at the half, a big play that looked even bigger four minutes into the second half when a snap to punter David Sanger went over his head, giving Maine the ball at UMass' nine-yard line. A pass interference call on Lamarr Monterio put the ball on the three, where Maine quarterback Jake Eaton plunged to paydirt, cutting the lead to 13-10.

But the Minuteman offense, especially the offensive line, answered right back. The O-line opened holes for Cobbs on the ensuing drive (three rushes for 13 yards) and gave Krohn enough time to find Bruce twice for 27 total yards and then Zullo in the right corner of the endzone, making the score 20-10. Krohn hit No. 2 on a lob over triple coverage from Maine.

All that attention for Zullo didn't hurt his productivity. The Pompano Beach, Fla. native caught six balls for 104 yards and two touchdowns.

"[Zullo] is just a great football player," Whipple said. "He's a difference maker. That's one reason why the draw is open, because they have to double him."

The Maine defenders did their best to keep the UMass receivers in front of them, denying the big play. This left the short passing game open for Krohn to find his receivers.

"[UMass] just tries to nickel and dime you down the field and there's nothing you can do about that," Maine safety David Cusano said. "We'll give them that rather than give up the 50-yard touchdown pass they've been getting all season."

Krohn completed 12-of-22 pass attempts for 176 yards and two touchdowns.

"Their [receivers] are good," Cosgrove said. "They've got some skill receivers. No. 2 [Zullo] is good. I'll take him.

"Their relationship with the quarterback is getting better."

There may have been more than eight minutes left in the third quarter, but the next drive essentially ended the game.

"Our defense stepped up and held them in the second half and made some big plays," Whipple said.

Eaton ran for four yards, then hit sophomore receiver Christian Pereira for a first down. But the drive ended there as Eaton fumbled a snap and UMass All-American tackle Valdamar Brower recovered the ball. Maine fumbled four snaps in the first half, but Brower's recovery was the only one snatched by the Minutemen.

"There is really nothing you can do [about fumbling the snap]," Eaton said. "It is kind of a freak thing. Within a drive the ball gets swampy, it's all mud. Sometimes I was getting them sometimes I wasn't. It's both our jobs [center's and quarterback's] to get the ball. It's just something that happened and we'll try to work on it in practice."

The Maroon and White may not have scored on the next drive, but it did get a major advantage in the field position game, which helped in holding Maine scoreless the rest of the way. In fact, Maine made just three first downs the rest of the way and never again crossed midfield.

"I don't know that we felt that we had a chance to move the ball through the air against them in the fourth quarter," Cosgrove said. "It just hadn't happened and it's tough to find."

More conservative play calling and a Cobbs fumble on the Maine 11-yard line kept UMass off the board in the fourth quarter. But the defense killed Eaton, recording sacks, tipping passes, and hauling down an interception in the final frame.

"They defended us very well," Cosgrove said. "They took a lot of things away from us that have been successful."

"We didn't really run it," Eaton said. "We didn't really throw it well. We weren't getting open, we weren't catching it well."

Eaton, who came into the game as the second most efficient passer in the A-10, struggled against UMass, completing just 12-of-35 pass attempts and throwing a pair of interceptions.

Sniper shoots terror expert

Investigators search for clues at the latest sniper shooting at the Seven Corners Shopping Center in Falls Church, Va. on Tuesday.

By Allen G. Breed
ASSOCIATED PRESS

FALLS CHURCH, Va. (AP) - An FBI analyst who assessed terrorist threats was identified Tuesday as the ninth person killed by the Washington-area sniper, shot in the head in an attack investigators say has yielded the most detailed clues yet.

For the first time, witnesses were able to give information about license plates on vehicles seen fleeing the scene, including a light-colored Chevrolet Astrovan with a burned-out rear taillight.

A law enforcement official, speaking on condition of anonymity, said another witness gave a description of a dark-skinned, possibly Hispanic or Middle Eastern, man in a white van.

"There was some additional information that we were able to get from last night's case, and I am confident that that information is going to lead us to an arrest in the case," Fairfax County Police Chief Tom Manger said.

Law enforcement sources said there were no indications the sniper targeted 47-year-old Linda Franklin because of her job. She worked for the FBI's Cyber-Crimes Division, created last year to focus on computer crimes as well as intellectual property cases.

Montgomery County (Md.) Police Chief Charles Moose, the head of the investigation, emphasized that Franklin was not working on the sniper case.

Franklin, a 47-year-old mother of two grown children, was killed Monday night as she and her husband loaded packages into their convertible in the parking lot outside a Home Depot at the Seven Corners Shopping Center. Ballistics evidence Tuesday connected the sniper to the slaying.

"Linda was a dedicated employee, and she will be missed," said FBI Director Robert Mueller. "All of us are deeply shocked and angry over this tragedy."

An FBI chaplain at Franklin's Arlington home said Franklin and her husband were planning to move Friday to another home in the area and were at Home Depot to buy supplies for the move and the new house.

Robert Young, a Washington construction worker, returned to the shopping center Tuesday to talk with police. He said he heard a muffled gunshot and saw a white van.

Young said as he backed his truck out of his parking spot, a white Astrovan with two men inside tried to turn into his lane. He said the driver appeared very agitated to find his way blocked and instead drove by a neighboring Chinese restaurant and out of sight.

Young described the driver as a short man of slight build who appeared to be Mideastern. He said, "I got a good look at the guy."

The driver "seemed to be excessively irritated because he couldn't pull into my lane," he said. "I thought this fool was going to want to get out of the van and duke or something. But he didn't. He kept on going."

Since Oct. 2, nine people have been killed and two others wounded, all of them cut down by a single bullet fired from a distance with a high-powered rifle as the victims went about their everyday tasks. The sniper's only apparent communication with investigators has been a tarot death card inscribed, "Dear Policeman, I am God."

In a continuing appeal for the public's help, Moose released composite images of a white van with roof racks that witnesses saw after Friday's slaying of a man at a gas station near Fredericksburg, Va.

Moose said there appeared to be similarities between the van seen at Friday's shooting and the light-colored van from Monday night's attack.

Manger would not say whether the witnesses to the latest attack were able to give complete license plate numbers to investigators.

"Each shooting has revealed more to this investigation. We're encouraged every day," said Michael Bouchard, an agent with the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms.

The sniper escaped a huge dragnet that closed down a tangle of highways around Falls Church, 10 miles west of the nation's capital. Traffic was backed up for miles as police surrounded and searched dozens of white vans.

Ted Burke, a former Maryland police officer who teaches criminal justice at Radford University in Virginia, said the killer is either escaping before the dragnet comes or has some kind of hideout where he can watch the chaos that erupts.

Class of 1950 dedicates bronze statue

The University of Massachusetts Class of 1950 dedicated a bronzed statue of a Minuteman as a part of Homecoming weekend. The eight-foot-tall statue, located between the Old Chapel and the Campus Pond, cost about $100,000 and was sculpted by retired Art professor John F. Townsend.

Ritter visits UMass

By Mark Ostroff
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Former United Nations Weapons Inspector and Intelligence Officer Scott Ritter spoke to a full Memorial Building auditorium at Deerfield Academy last night, addressing concerns on war with Iraq.

Ritter, known for his controversial stance on war with Iraq, spent the evening talking about the realities of war and sanctions, his own experiences in Iraq as an inspector, and eventually discussing the U.S. role in what he called a "corruption of the process" of weapons inspection.

"War is not Nintendo. War is terminal," said Ritter, in his opening lines. "There's no rock and roll music playing and no banners unfurling."

Talking on the reality of war, he told about his experiences in Urban Warfare training, as a Marine Intelligence Officer.

"In urban warfare, you don't get to say 'oops'," he commented.

Ritter expressed concerned with urban warfare as a potential situation that may result in a war with Iraq. According to Ritter, Baghdad, a city about the size of Detroit, has a population of about five million people. In describing an invasion on Baghdad, he referred to General Anthony Zinni's description of "30 days of playing the last 15 minutes of Saving Private Ryan, over and over again."

After his talk on war, he briefly acknowledged his own political stance on war. Ritter had addressed the audience with his belief in causes worth fighting for.

"There is a time when we must fight for what we believe in," Ritter said. "There may be a time and a place when America may have to take up arms."

He described these causes as taking measures in upholding the Constitution, maintaining that his sworn oath, as a Marine, was for only this reason.

Further into the evening, Ritter addressed the issue of U.N. Sanctions and U.S. "corruption" in the inspections. He first spoke about weapons inspections in Iraq and the risks methods of getting his job done, which included tapping phones, archeological digs, and a seizure of invoices from countries, which ultimately led to confronting Iraqi officials with knowledge of hidden weapons.

As part of his story, Ritter expressed concern over the U.N. putting sanctions on Iraq.

"Sanctions," he explained, were "designed to hurt a population so civilians hold their government accountable."

Touching on the U.S. desire to oust Hussein, he told how the U.S. had expected the sanctions to last only six months, in hoping to "contain [Hussein]." The sanctions, he believes have killed between 350,000 and 1.2 million people. With the sanctions not working, he described how the U.S. attempted three coups on Saddam Hussein, all of which were sponsored by the CIA.

As his story went on, Ritter claimed that the Pentagon had "corrupted the process," by using the intelligence data he had gathered on Saddam Hussein's whereabouts for strategic planning. That resulted in a bombing of Iraq, destroying 97 targets, only 11 of them being military.

"The rest were Saddam's palaces and offices," he said.

Ritter especially believed these incidents had ruined the credibility of the weapons inspection process, what he believes to be the cause of Iraq's noncompliance.

"Iraq is learning to not love America," Ritter said.

During a question and answer session after his talk, Ritter was asked about Iraq being a true threat.

"I don't know," he said, "we need more information."

Referring to the leads he got as a weapons inspector, Ritter said that U.S. corruption had caused a compromise in his leads on weapons in Iraq, forcing him to discard almost all of them. He went on to express his concerns that he shared with President Bush, and demanded that more evidence be seen before sending Americans to war.

"We should exhaust every venue, short of war before sending men and women off to die in our name," Ritter said.

Before the night was over, Ritter was asked for a response of President Bush's claim, in his Oct. 7 address, that Iraq had used bugging devices in order to keep a step ahead of inspectors. In explaining that he knew that the Iraqis would try to bug them, he had described the measures taken in preventing unwanted surveillance in Iraq.

"President Bush lied to the American people," he said.

Ritter ended the night with a brief speech. Referring to the Republican push for war, Ritter called on Democrats by saying:

"From a Republican to a Democrat: don't ever let someone wrap themselves in the flag and intimidate you to silence ever again."

Ending with a small somber note to the audience Ritter asked people to think.

"The saddest thing you will ever see is a mother shoveling dirt on her 28 year-old son," Ritter said. "Imagine how many mothers are going to have to shovel dirt on their sons."

Lockheed Martin begins relationship with SOM

By Matt Casey
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

The Massachusetts Small Business Development Center (MSBDC) at the University of Massachusetts Isenberg School of Management has announced the creation of a formal working relationship with aerospace giant Lockheed Martin. The arrangement should bring Lockheed Martin contracts to small businesses in Massachusetts.

Lou Wigdor, communications director at the Isenberg School of Management, said that the Procurement Technical Assistance Center (PTAC) was key in getting the contract, "specifically government contracts."

Wigdor said that the PTAC helps by "finding things in the federal register" and showing it to Massachusetts businesses willing and capable of doing the job.

The parties involved in this deal have agreed to develop action plans and set timetables. Also, they are establishing a common framework for sharing ideas, innovations, and solutions.

Wigdor said that "presumably tech businesses" would be involved in the Lockheed contracts. It is also likely that industrial businesses could be involved and that there is a chance that some service-oriented businesses could also be involved.

"The real work begins today to demonstrate our commitment to working with small businesses," said Michael Robinson, program manager for the PTAC.

Georgianna Parkin, director of the MSBDC network, said, "This is a great day for small businesses in Massachusetts and around the country."

Wigdor cited the war with Iraq as one of the reasons for this deal. "Lockheed is a big military provider," Wigdor said.

The PTAC network has five locations throughout the state, with its headquarters at the School of Management. It helps small businesses write business and marketing plans. The PTAC also sometimes aids in basic business skills. It also operates two specialty centers – the International Trade Program/Massachusetts Export Center, which helps set up businesses at trade shows and find markets overseas, and the Minority Business Center. This aid was given to more than 7,000 small business clients in 2002.

Lockheed Martin is headquartered in Bethesda, Md. They employ 125,000 people worldwide and focus on research, design, development, manufacture and integration of advanced technology systems, products and services. Lockheed reported $24 billion in sales for 2001.

Weekly news meetings have been changed to Thursdays at 4 p.m. in the Campus Center basement for all those interested in writing for news.

The Minuteman statue:

A reminder to remember

Heads up, there's a new man in town.

This past weekend the Class of 1950 dedicated a statue of the university mascot, the Minuteman, on the Student Union Lawn. The statue, towering over the grassy field, is the most obvious statue of one of our better-known school symbols. One reason the class chose to erect the monument is because it is a "patriotic symbol." This, according to Don Progulske, is especially noteworthy because the class of 1,100 had at least 900 veterans.

The bronze statue is the end result of alumni canvassing and generous donations, including a $15,000 from Eugene and Ronnie Isenberg. The Isenberg School of Management is named after Eugene. So, there is a noticeable statue on campus. But what else is there?

Most buildings, park benches, gardens and trees on this campus are a strong representation of those who have come before us. Memorial Hall, perhaps the most obvious, is an entire edifice erected from alumni donations. Every residence hall and building has a name attached to it that somehow represents our past. The Minuteman statue may be the most obvious. It may become the most readily available symbol of our school, but It is not the only standout of our school's past.

There was a Herter, a Bartlett, a Tobin, and even a Whitmore as people, not just names, long before they were ever connected to campus buildings.

We should go beyond just remembering one class' donation power, or pointing out the obvious memorials that have been brought to campus. It would help to preserve the people whose names we choose if we knew more about them.

Right now it is safe to say that, with the exception of our Southwest towers, people are relatively unfamiliar with the names behind the buildings. Even with the more recognizable names, there are certainly visitors and likely some residents that come and go without any consideration to their new home's namesake.

It is not going to change anyone's mentality just because they learned something about their residence hall. People will probably not change their opinion about Cance just because they know who Cance was, or Van Meter because they find out the significance behind the name Van Meter.

Hopefully, though, by developing some knowledge of what surrounds us, students and staff alike will be able to gain an appreciation for the history of our campus. Campus identity is a long sought-after ideal; UMass is often regarded by individual identities. There are no links between a Chemical Engineering major that spends his time in the labs of the Conte polymer building and a Journalism student who spends his time in the hallowed halls of Bartlett.

Perhaps, by providing some of this common history, UMass students can find a way to define themselves as one entity, instead of being divided into classes, residential areas, interests and majors.

Big money...no talk shows...stop!

MCKENDRY

Everyone remembers being a joyous little kid on a snow day. If you're not from a cold weather climate, just play along. There was no schoolwork to worry about, no bag lunch of peanut butter and jelly that had to be eaten; it was just a day for your own amusement, kind of like a day during summer vacation, just with extra white stuff on the ground. When I was in elementary school, my grandparents looked after my siblings and I, as both my parents had to go to those jobs of theirs. I had great fun with Mim and Pip, with one of my fondest memories being the watching of an infinite amount of game shows on television.

"The Price Is Right," "Sale of the Century," "Pyramid," "Scrabble," "Hollywood Squares," "Chain Reaction," "Family Feud" "Bumper Stumpers," "Name That Tune," "Press Your Luck," "The Tac Dough," "Wipeout," "High Rollers," "Jackpot," "Let's Make A Deal." I could go on, but I think you get the point.

Some shows aired on basic television, but a lot of my viewing came courtesy of the USA Network. As a side note, does anyone really know when that channel started going down the tubes?) One could almost guarantee non-stop viewing of these shows from 10 a.m. until late afternoon. It was paradise.

The game's gimmick was of course the main draw. Shows like "Scrabble," "Pyramid," and "Chain Reaction" tested your grasp of the English language. "Name That Tune" discovered who really could name a five minute song in one note. "Bumper Stumpers" proved who was good at reading vanity license plates. "Let's Make A Deal" answered the age old question of, "where did the freaks of America go to gather together?" And by the way, what exactly is a whammy?

Almost nearly as important as the format was the host. Some hosts have forever become identified with a single show they hosted, such as Richard Dawson, Bob Barker, Pat Sajak, or Alex Trebek. Others worked an entire career rotating around the game show circuit, such as Peter Tomarken, Bob Eubanks, and Wink Martindale, (someone should name their son Wink. Really, it'd be funny), who, by the way, has hosted a whopping 16 different game shows, according to the Game Show Network.

Regardless of whether or not the emcee was an icon, I think we all can admit that it has to be one of the easiest jobs in the world. You get up, go to work, put a suit on, make stupid jokes about Joe Six-pack from middle America, maybe give out some money, and then go home. If there's a way into this field, sign me up!

Speaking of the contestants, where do they come up with some of these people? Honestly, in the span of a single day you can see everyone from Albert Einstein wannabes right down to the people whose intellect ranges just above that of slugs. "Jeopardy" has found people who know everything about anything and displays them nightly to put everyone in their place. At the same time, "Family Feud" has given many moments of hilarity when ordinary people are put under pressure. Example: Name the month when a woman first begins to show she's pregnant? Answer: September. (If you need to think about that, Richard Karn, the current host, has a spot waiting just for you.)

"Name the month when a woman first begins to show she's pregnant?"

I loved watching all these game shows. I took particular delight at some instances where I, an elementary school student, was able to answer a question or solve a puzzle that an adult on TV could not. Somewhere along the way though, the game show lost its cool, and networks decided that Jerry Springer and Ricki Lake made better daytime viewing choices than a person trying to win $10,000. (It really does sound that stupid!) Then came the savior, the legend, the Notre Dame alum...the almighty Regis.

With the debut of "Who Wants to Be a Millionaire," the game show began a resurgence. The old standbys of "Wheel of Fortune," "Jeopardy," and "The Price Is Right" had always been there, but now more game shows were entering into the mix. Though Regis' show and its numerous prime time clones have vanished, the long-ranging affects have been the creation of the daytime spin-offs "Millionaire" and "Weakest Link", and the return of classics, most notably the Donny Osmond hosted "Pyramid." In an interview, Osmond said that he credits Regis Philbin with making the job of a game show host respectable again (as if it ever wasn't).

I'm grateful for the rise in game shows again. They are a great form of entertainment that no matter how many times television has tried to destroy them, they just return with a vengeance. Even better is the fact that I'm now old enough to participate. My first target is the aforementioned "Pyramid" which I've been practicing for. I'm thinking maybe over Spring Break, when I'm in San Diego, I'll take a drive up the Pacific Coast and pay a visit to Donny. Don't any of you get the same idea: the money is mine. Though I do have some lovely parting gifts for you.

Prince George, Iraq, and other stuff

CAREY

Procrastinating from the endless slew of homework that I'm constantly faced with, I was channel-surfing a few nights ago. I stopped on one station when my eye caught something strange. The president was giving a speech. Normally, seeing the thick-witted expressions on "W"'s small wrinkled head wouldn't have caused me to raise an eyebrow. But he was on a major television station, during primetime, attempting to justify the unjustifiable.

I was amused at the situation, and listened to a speech of backwards logic that I had heard a number of times in previous weeks. I waited for George II to fumble over his words. It's sad to think that after his father spent millions of dollars having young Georgie educated at the finest institutes of learning that he still can't read the words off of a teleprompter with any kind of recognizable articulation.

I waited patiently for him to bring up the fact that Saddam had tried killing George I. That's my favorite part of this speech. The idea that I should be sympathetic because one heartless goon tried killing another heartless goon always causes me to slap my knee. For me, that hardly qualifies as an excuse to invade Iraq. The late comedian Bill Hicks had an interesting alternative to that problem: "The U.S. should have embarrassed the Iraqis; we should have killed George Bush and said that's how you do it... Don't fk with us. And that way there would have been no loss of innocent life." Instead, we kept George Bush alive and made his goofy oaf of a son the leader of what is fancifully called the "free world."

Despite all the malicious acts he did, does, and will commit, it's hard for me to be genuinely mad at someone so painfully stupid as George Walker Bush. Unlike presidents before him, half the time I don't think he is even aware of all the harm he is causing. For this reason I don't think young Bush is going to be treated kindly by the history books. Not since Warren G. Harding have we seen so much buffoonery in such high places. I see "W" being remembered, for some time to come, not as the stalwart leader of post-9-11 America, but as the idiotic prince of Machiavellian puppetry.

There's no doubt in anyone's mind that the lion's share of decision making is done quietly by Dick Cheney, Colin Powell and associates. George W's shriveled head is nothing more than the legitimate face to the small oligarchic ring of fat cats that rule this country. His supporters, as far as I can tell, relate to the charisma, and lack of any detectable intellect in his facial mannerisms and rhetoric. However, perhaps its best, in some regards, that George II isn't responsible for the decision making. Let's not forget this is a man who staunchly believes in Creation.

In the midst of the whole Iraq debate, many people are confused as to whether it's wiser to be neutral or protective. Despite all the eloquent speeches on national television, many are still unclear about the White House's reasoning behind going after Iraq. But perhaps this little story can shed some light the administration's motives.

My dad works for a company that makes oil valves, and other industrial products. He's in charge of shipping. Not surprisingly, his company's main customer is the Middle East. He related to me, a little while ago, that after the Persian Gulf War he was given orders to duplicate all the shipping forms that had been made to Iraq and Kuwait within that last four years. Essentially, his company did four years of business in six weeks. The name of my father's company is Halliburton Masonrilen, the same company that Dick Cheney was chairman of before becoming vice president. His severance package, before entering politics, was in the area of $40 million, and I believe he kept his stock options(at least for a time), which would make him one of the primary holders.

If you're sensing a conflict of interest, then you're not alone. However, if you're not, then perhaps the rhetoric defecating from the mouth of the President is for you. Perhaps George is correct, and blowing up Iraq, again, will strengthen our chances of long-term national security? Maybe Iraqi peasants won't mind dodging rockets? They certainly have had enough practice. And perhaps the Iraqi oil reserve is nothing more than a footnote to the entire debate. If nothing else is certain, war with Iraq will give my dad adequate justification to ask for a pay raise.

In the random cross hairs of a serial sniper

FRANCES CARR

Plans had been set and arrangements had been made. I wasn't going to let anything get in my way, not even a sharp shooting sniper. It was with this attitude that I set out for Maryland the past weekend.

My sister is a first year graduate student at the University of Maryland at College Park. College Park is in Prince George's County, one of the recently targeted communities of the "sniper," as the media has dubbed him. I drove from Amherst to New Jersey to meet my travel companion.

Upon my Thursday evening arrival, he was a wreck. He said he had an uneasy feeling about the trip and had been advised by numerous people not to go. I argued that I too had an uneasy feeling and friends and family on my back about traveling to the "danger zone" but after lengthy contemplation, I had gotten over it. I wasn't going to let some ghost gunman spoil my long-standing weekend plans. Besides that, the chances of us being targeted were miniscule. How cowardly would I seem to my sister, who is living and functioning in the midst of all this, if I cancelled? I looked to her for a cue. I called and asked her what she thought I should do. She told me that she too was scared and entirely understood our reservations. This conversation, which she intended as a means for me to back out, made me all the more insistent on going.

My friend interpreted it differently, he took it as further grounds for us not to go. I gave him the option of staying. I had no intention of subjecting him to a situation in which he was not comfortable being. He argued that I was being stubborn and foolish and that he was not going to let me go alone. I resolved that even if he did come with me, he wouldn't enjoy a minute of the weekend. After what seemed like hours of back and forth bickering, he relented and I sort of convinced him that we should go.

On Friday morning, we were on the road. We opted not to listen to the news and put on some loud music to drown out our fears. Right before getting on the highway we stopped at a convenience store to get some coffee. We had tried to steer clear but the news found us. The radio announcer told us that there had been another shooting in Virginia just an hour earlier. My friend stormed out of the store, leaving his coffee behind. I met him in the car where he was livid. He said that he had made a pact with himself that if anything else happened, he wouldn't go, and it had. Again, I pleaded with him to follow his instincts and told him that I was fine to go it alone. But again, he relented for fear of my safety.

We drove in silence for a long time. I was extremely scared but felt I couldn't share my uncertainties. If I revealed that I was nervous, my already apprehensive companion would be even more anxious. I had to suck it up, for his sake and for our peace of mind.

We finally entered Maryland and decided that even though the fuel gauge read more than half full, we should stock up well out of the D.C. area to be safe. We pulled into an eerily deserted major service area right off of the highway that in any other time would have been bustling with travelers. The motorists at the station were either in their cars waiting for the tank to fill or looking suspiciously around, both at their gas station peers and the parking lot beside. I got out and began pumping my gas. I happened to have the misfortune of getting a nozzle that didn't have a lever to keep the gas flowing without having to attend to it. I held on to it, but moved around, constantly ducking and weaving beside the shelter of the car so as not to give a potential sniper a clear, still shot. I looked across the way and tried to make out the license plate of a white van I saw. I scoped out the grassy knoll at my left and squinted my eyes, trying to spot a person crouching in the woods. When the tank filled up and the nozzle popped, I jumped. For an instant I was sure that I had been the latest victim.

After getting off of Interstate 95 and onto Route 1, the second sign of the times made itself clear. Stopped at traffic lights, we noticed that no one would pull up beside us or anyone for that matter. Cars were staggered carefully making sure that they weren't too close. Gas stations looked deserted and very few people roamed the street in this usually busy college town.

We continued on our way and finally made it to my sister's apartment in Riverdale, a town right next to College Park. We called her from the car, before we got out, so that we wouldn't have to wait outside. When I finally saw her safe and sound, I felt like weeping with relief. Later when we went out for dinner we ran to and from the car.

That first day was the worst of it. On day two, we actually managed to venture into Washington, D.C. and cautiously explored Georgetown on foot.

Returning home, we stayed glued to the television, waiting for news of the next casualty.

The coverage continued non-stop. Montgomery County Police Chief Charles Moose got angry with the media and their relentless coverage, claiming they were jeopardizing the investigation. Witnesses to the crimes were interviewed but they all said practically the same thing: everyone is hysterical and that the victims were completely caught off guard. Residents of the community told how they traveled to Delaware to do their grocery shopping and fill up their gas tanks. I wondered if they realized that they were twenty times more likely to die in a traffic accident en route.

We left Maryland early Monday afternoon. By the time I returned to Amherst, another life had been claimed. A woman crossing the street with her husband in a busy parking lot was gunned down with one single bullet and left for dead.

The thing that frightens and unnerves me the most is the prospect that the later victims saw it coming. Surely they were aware of the tiny possibility that they were risking their lives by getting gas or picking up some goods at Home Depot. At the very instant that the bullet hit their flesh and ripped away their lives, were they thinking about the sniper? I know it was in the front of my mind every second that I was outdoors.

This deranged man has done more than claim the lives of nine people; he has also murdered everyone's sense of security in carrying out their every-day routines. No one feels safe, and why should they? Not only has this person or people been incredibly accurate in his aim but also he or she or they have no apparent bias toward men, women or children. On top of all of that, he has been entirely successful in his killing spree, eluding round-the-clock investigators in six counties, and escaping completely undetected and unscathed. While authorities take in and rule out leads and frantically search, racing against the clock, this person is probably sitting back and watching it all unfold on his television, seeing his victims faces for the first time, using the information given by the media to plan his next assassination.

I certainly am not one to partake in hysteria, but before and during this visit to D.C., I found myself very much affected. But what can we do to ease our minds and to protect ourselves? Stay indoors all day everyday until they apprehend this madman? Pray that when we finally do need to refuel the car that has been running on fumes, the sniper will be on an off day? I do not have the answer. All that I can recommend is to be cautious, move quickly, and try to go about business as usual. Sadly, we don't have any other choice.

The Transporter is a sleek thriller, albeit with a weak plot

By Johnny Donaldson
COLLEGIAN STAFF

THE TRANSPORTER
Directed by Cory Yuen
Starring Jason Statham and Shu Qi
Playing at Cinemark 12 in Hadley

Underworld "transporter" Frank Martin (Jason Statham) keeps his life simple living by three rules of the job – no changing the plan, no names and no opening the package. At the outset of The Transporter, Frank is hired to be getaway driver for a trio of bank robbers in France. Four pile into his black BMW. He refuses to move until one of them is gone. The fourth robber winds up on the curb, a bullet in his head. Frank speeds away, leading the cops on a spectacular, high-speed chase through the winding streets of Nice.

The Transporter is the kind of sleek and stylish action thriller that the numbing Ballistic: Ecks vs. Sever wants to be. At first glance, the movie seems like nothing more than the kind of martial arts-and-guns action trash that regularly stars people like Steven Seagal and Jean Claude Van Damme. Directed by Cory Yuen, a Hong Kong fight choreographer, The Transporter is trash, but marvelously aerodynamic and exciting trash.

Frank's new job is to transport a large duffel bag for an American named Wall Street. When he discovers that the bag is wriggling and making sounds, a crisis of conscience strikes and he opens the package. Inside is a beautiful Chinese girl, Lai (Shu Qi). At first she seems helpful – too much so – baking madeleines and making tea. Then Frank's life gets complicated. His car is blown to bits, and so is his coastal villa. He discovers that Wall Street and the girl's father (who resembles Liza Manelli after an extreme facelift) are conspiring to smuggle in Chinese slaves into France.

The plot of The Transporter sounds like the kind of pure convoluted idiocy that would be the backbone of a Van Damme picture – and it is. But the movie has been made with such precision and craftsmanship that it hardly matters. The producer and co-writer is Luc Besson, the bombastic mastermind behind such examples of flashy overkill as The Messenger and The Fifth Element. He tones down, somewhat, here and lets Yuen handle the job of staging a series of skillful action sequences. There are remarkable fights in an empty bus terminal on top of an oil slick, and another in Wall Street's villa: the car chase is as awesome as the one in the more substantial The Bourne Identity. Occasionally, the dialogue tilts into the overripe ("I was an ex-little boy once" says a French cop; "He was a bastard, but he was my dad" says Qi, after shooting her father). But Besson was never one known for his writing.

Statham, the actor from Guy Ritchie's films (Lock, Stock and Two Smoking Barrels and Snatch) has the balding looks of a Brit Bruce Willis and he acts with cool, elegant precision. This isn't Shakespeare exactly, but Statham moves the proceedings along quickly with his action hero glower. Qi is a seductive damsel in distress, but her range? Who knows?

The Transporter misses chances it could have taken (Besson and Yuen take what could've been a dissection of amorality and turn it into a straight up action film). Slick and hollow, yet thoroughly entertaining, The Transporter delivers. B (Fox; rated PG-13 for violent sequences and some sensuality; 92 mins)

Lights, camera, magic! Ladytron use a little magic to mix up their album

By Timothy Gabriele
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

LADYTRON
Light and Magic Emperor Norton

One would be hard pressed to come across a review or article regarding Emperor Norton's hot four-piece commodity Ladytron without encountering some reference to a certain decade about 20 years previous to our own. For all its 80s comparisons though, the sound on Ladytron's deliciously demented new bubblegum electro album Light and Magic is undeniably now, and don't try blaming it on some lame 80s comeback.

Perhaps the major force driving the various new romantic comparisons is the band's insistence on putting classic analog synthesizers at the forefront of its sound (though the band does not exclusively use said instruments). Years ago, when this technology fell by the wayside in favor of new digital and computer-generated sounds, electronic music (or at least good electronic music) veered away from top 40 radio in favor of the discotheque. Vocals often disappeared altogether and warm soul of the machine that futurist German rockers Kraftwerk tried to impress upon listeners was replaced by pounding four-on-the-floor beats mechanized for use with happy pills.

Recently there has been an attempt to recapture the same excitement that existed in electronic music in the late 1970s and early 80s when the synthesizer became more than a novelty instrument used by kitschy lounge lizards or more-avant-garde-than-thou art school musique concrete experimentalists.

By utilizing classic analog synthesizers, Ladytron score a sound electro-pop album with Light and Magic bringing back 80's-esque sounds to pop music.

Labeled Nu-Electro or Electroclash (after Larry Tee's now annual Electroclash festival which will be touring the country this year), the style tends to glorify, pay homage to, and often perform covers from that certain decade. The worst of which some off like Depeche Mode trying to rewrite Speak and Spell now, after all that heroin, when it's no longer relevant (ahem, Soviet), often indulging in keyboard patterns so repetitive that Wesley Willis would blush with envy. The best music in this genre nearly reanimates one's sense of confidence in pop music altogether. This is where Ladytron step in.

It seems to be a rule of thumb that when a new "in" phrase gets tossed around with regard to a new sound, the artists most closely associated with that genre take all measures to avoid it. Ladytron, like the best of the burgeoning "electro-clash" scene (with the exception of maybe New York's Fischerspooner), refuse to be categorized within the realm of their peers. However, unlike some of the scene's usual suspects, Ladytron really do walk outside of the boundaries of what has become standard electroclash fare. Rather than sounding like a level off of Double Dragon or a missing Visage B-side, Ladytron create a unique indie-pop ambiance that is distinctly its own. Though they often follow many of the same lo-fi guidelines as their contemporaries (their debut EP "Commodore Rock" was named after the primitive Commodore 64 computers that helped make the album), they are not governed by them. From the glossed up catchier-than-the-plague synth-pop of "Blue Jeans" to the rapid-paced Bulgarian speech in "Nuhorizons," Ladytron span the history of electronic music and beyond, utilizing all of their influences for a singular effect.

That effect can eloquently be described by the band's name, which appears to either be a reference to a Roxy Music song or the lost Transformer. Either way, it is an adequate description of the dark and demented pop stew that they brew. Despite the fact that Ladytron is only 50% female, there's a unique femininity to the ambiance of their compositions. It's not feminist by any means (this is not Grrrltron) and despite the often androgynous, monotone vocals, there's a warmth that cries of double X chromosomes all over. Perhaps the deep-throated and vaguely sinister robotic voices that haunt Light and Magic would not serve as fulfilling lullabies to just anyone, but Mira Aroyo and Helena Marnie could sing me to sleep any night of the week and I would be a happy boy.

Maybe rather than a transformer, Voltron might be a better symbol of Ladytron's structural unit. They aren't just four wankers sitting around their laptops pointing and clicking (not that there's anything wrong with that,...). The four main players really do act as one cohesive unit forgoing the four-on-the-floor in favor of genuine musicianship. Hypnotizing synth solos that avoid that Todd Rundgren-esque sleep-inducing prog aesthetic coupled with layers of effects recalling the shoegazers of yore (My Bloody Valentine, Ride, etc.) remove Ladytron from the replicating electroclash crop, so much so that you almost want to remove them from that category altogether. However, Ladytron sound so close to what every failed electro act wishes it could accomplish that it would almost be criminal to remove them from their position as reigning champions of synth-pop Noveau.

The lyrics are creepy, cryptic, and cool, often sinking so far into the mix that they simply act as another instrument. While this method does contribute to the distinctive polished sound of Ladytron, it's almost unfortunate. Bringing up the vocals in certain songs could almost lend these eerily effervescent melodies on top 40 radio (in an ideal world, I guess). "They only want you when you're seventeen/ When you're twenty-one/ you're no fun/ They take a polaroid and let you go/ Say they'll let you know/ So come on" Marnie incessantly chants on "Seventeen" commenting on either the fashion industry (to which electroclash is heavily attached, might I add) or child pornography. In all likelihood, it's about both. Though chanted, the lyrics are hardly anthemic like latter-day Depeche Mode. Ladytron is too reserved to demand that you shake your ass, too wryly cynical to be angry, and too naturally sexy and beautiful to call attention to itself.

Light and Magic is not without its faults. It does break out the overabundant vocoders and robot voices over the course of the album and obsesses over long drawn-out arpeggiated analogue synth notes. Because of this, the album does grow a bit exhausting by the end of its 15 tracks, which is a shame because the final tracks are gems, every bit as catchy and pleasing as the rest. Its strengths more than compensate for its weaknesses however, and any listener curious at a peek into the future...ahem, the present of pop music will not be disappointed.

Reuben Wu will be performing a Ladytron DJ Set on Oct. 28 at Pearl Street Night Club in Northampton at 8:30 p.m. Tickets must be purchased in advance at the Northampton Box Office or by calling 1-800-THE-TICK.

One ring to rule them all?

THE RING
Directed by Gore Verbinski
Starring Naomi Watts
Opens today at area theaters

There's something [illegible] known among the teenagers of the school as the cursed videotape. Once one watches it, exactly seven days later it contacts one, receives a phone call stating that he or she will be within one week. And one week later, he or she is found dead with eyes wide open and a grotesque, [illegible] frozen on their face, an obscene parody of fear.

The Ring has already been [illegible] to an eerie speckled horror [illegible] I haven't seen what to do with it. The premise [illegible] a cursed video [illegible] Japanese [illegible] Hollywood [illegible] Watts [illegible] became [illegible] time in the country's history [illegible] though it was never made [illegible] Dreamworks [illegible] version is one of those flicks [illegible] built to suffocate [illegible] the audience to stick its [illegible] horrors can be genuinely frightening [illegible] jump-fests chill, shudders and [illegible] the Ring, absolutely never builds [illegible] tension. Yet most horror freakouts [illegible] it's spent [illegible] about as haunted as a carnival ride.

Naomi [illegible] talented ingenue [illegible] Brad Pitt [illegible] Julia Roberts [illegible] Mulholland Drive, [illegible] Rachel Keller, a reporter [illegible] Her niece was [illegible] Rachel [illegible] mistakes she [illegible] happened [illegible] girl [illegible] Rachel [illegible] them with [illegible] Harry [illegible] [illegible] to woodsy [illegible] [illegible] watch [illegible] [illegible] phone call. At [illegible] [illegible] seven days.

The [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] but when [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Not exactly. The images of the video are meant to evoke sweaty palmed fear – we are meant to feel like we are watching grainy video images of hell – but the video, for all its disturbing imagery, it seems like nothing more than an avant-garde student film not for nothing does one character actually refer to it as being "very student film"). Images of rickety wooden ladders and Victorian mirrors don't exactly instill a sense of fear. Director Gore Verbinski and screenwriter Ehren Kruger would have benefited if they had not shown the video. They inspire so much anticipation that it's damn near impossible to live up to that anticipation. Imagination is a terrific tool for filmmakers to utilize, so why don't they utilize it? The accursed video just seems like so much arty claptrap.

The lack of fear in the video creates a void at the center of The Ring. We never begin to get a grip on why the characters are so afraid today, they have seven days to live, but – and that disconnects the audience from the mystery. It doesn't help that the characters are so deeply underdeveloped. Watts does a terrific job with what she's offered for Rachel but she's nothing more than a horror heroine. Martin Henderson (Windtalkers) plays the role of Rachel's ex Noah, and is a limit of the movie's reticence in fleshing out characters that we don't even know that the characters are exes until halfway through the film. Henderson's Noah is an even dimmer creation than Rachel; he exists as nothing but the scruffy handsome ex willing to provide help.

Verbinski is the director of last year's horrid The Mexican, an even dead zone in which good actors played zombified mannequins spouting New Age psychobabble and rancid post-Tarantino crimespeak. Working with the cold, autumnal cinematography of Bojan Bazelli, the director builds what was once described as a mood. But The Ring is all atmosphere and little follow through. Everything is shot in damp, gray tones that work to create a feeling of dread, but the scares are strangely neutered. There are a couple of tense scenes (particularly one involving a horse loose on a ferry) and Verbinski has fun in a horror movie climax that leads to a faux sequel-setup ending that for once doesn't feel gratuitous.

The Ring has a few spooky scares, but it feels oddly flat – like a reunion of a ghostly nightmare. The filmmakers may think they are making the next Polanski film, but instead of creating a vivid and involving nightmare they have made a bad dream that dissipates the next day. C+ (Dreamworks, rated PG-13 for thematic elements, disturbing images, language and some drug references. 120 mins.)

Every Tuesday night at 10:30, the world is privileged enough to watch the Prince of Darkness, his stomach stapled wife Sharon, his musically obsessed son Jack and his pink-haired punk rock daughter Kelly, live their lives for everyone to see and enjoy. There's nothing wrong with that, right? Watching Ozzy O-bizarrie stumble and stutter as he falls asleep with two of his several tiny dogs on the couch while watching the History Channel is perfectly normal for a rock star to do. duh!

Wait a second.

Who do people love more? The rock star Ozzy, former Black Sabbath member and founder of Ozzfest, one of the most successful tours in the world, or TV star Ozzy, also known as "the Dad" on MTV's new gangbusters, "The Osbournes"? I think that people are confusing both, especially some of the younger fans of Ozzy.

My question to you is this: Is Ozzy ruining his bad-ass rock star image by portraying himself as a moronic, preening, burnt-out father on TV?

Yes, Ozzy Osbourne is one of the most successful musical artists in the world, and now he's even bigger due to the fact that MTV has a new obsession with him and his family. Many kids who watch the show probably have no idea of Ozzy's history, except for the well-known fact that he had an incident or two that involved biting off the heads of some tiny non-domestic creatures that are normally displaced behind dark glass walls in the Bronx Zoo.

I'm sorry to say that Ozzy is now the laughing stock of late night MTV.

Millions of people tune in to watch Ozzy carry on conversation with his family members. Oh, wait one second. Let me clarify that. We can't hear about 75% of the conversation due to the fact that it's all cursing and bleeped out for our sugar-coated listening pleasure.

Sometimes when we step too close to the show, we ruin the illusion. Is that valid in regard to Ozzy? The Prince of Darkness doesn't seem so dark as his daughter Kelly yells at him about appointments with the gynecologist.

Don't get me wrong. I find Ozzy slowly taking out the garbage quite entertaining. I'm just a little concerned about Mr. Osbourne. I do remember Ozzy's Black Sabbath days, and I remember being somewhat scared of him. That's definitely not the case today. As I watch Jack look Ozzy in a closet and turn the lights off as he softly replies back in his monotonous British voice, "Open up the fin' door." I can't help but giggle to myself.

Ozzy, man – look at yourself. You're undoing your rock star image. Yes, you still go on tour and you're still a very successful musical artist, but how much of that is due to your new role on MTV?

The rest of the Osbourne clan definitely can't complain about Ozzy's new status as TV star. His wife Sharon is now viewed as not only his dedicated manager, but is also the new poster child for almost every magazine cover and talk show. Jack is working on his very own record label and is pursuing other aspects of music behind the scenes. Kelly is the most successful of them all. Her debut hit single, a cover of Madonna's "Papa Don't Preach" has been plastered all over radio stations and her debut CD, coming out Nov. 19, is expected to be a hit. I guess that they all have Ozzy to thank for their newfound notoriety.

So Ozzy – you owe a big hug and a kiss to the producers at MTV for making your life public and for our viewing pleasure. Hopefully, your new musical popularity is due to the music and not your TV show.

Well, at least Ozzy acts his age and isn't embarrassed to show everyone what decades of alcohol and drug abuse does to your head.

Get real: 12th 'World' sucks

LIZZY NIELSEN

This snapshot filled pretty well one of the reasons that the 12th season of the "Real World" has helped make it a sitcore Tuesday porno show.

I am a "Real World" junkie. I don't think I've missed an episode since the start of the Seattle season. I religiously watch marathons, sometimes spending six or seven hours in front of the TV. However, the current season, "Real World: Las Vegas" is a disgrace to the other 11. Instead of being the hormone-driven, somewhat real entertainment that always includes some kind of social issue, it has just become a half hour of soft-core pornography on Tuesday nights.

In past seasons, there has always been either a homosexual and a homophobe, or a black person and a racist, and usually in the end of the season the two extremes on the social spectrum become great friends, as was the case in the Chicago season with Chris and Theo. In the beginning of the season, Theo was shown in his interview as stating he "doesn't have gay friends," but later became very close with Chris, the just-out gay man in the house. In this season we have seen just about everyone in the cast have sex with everyone else, and MTV isn't shy about showing the footage.

In the season premiere, Trishelle hooks up with Steven. Not surprising. Usually, when a bunch of attractive twenty-somethings get together for the first time there is initial hooking up, but it typically doesn't last after the first night. And usually the focus of the show shifts after all the initial hooking up. It's already been five episodes, and I'm still waiting.

Yes, it was interesting to see Trishelle, Brynn and Steven participate in the threesome. That's definitely something we haven't seen before. But now we have Brynn with a crush on Steven, and now Arissa. While all this is going on, Irulan is hooking up with the scumbag of a boss, Marc. Well, apparently it isn't hooking up, it's just playing tonsil hockey under a blanket in Marc's hotel room. Regardless, the entire focus of the show is sex. Frank, the poor sap, is the only person who comes across deeper than a kiddie pool in the whole cast. I think it was on a "Road Rules" where the two casts did a competition at Lake Mead that Frank said something to the effect of "the only things we're good at are hooking up with each other, fighting, and leaving dirty dishes in the sink." This statement captures the essence of "Real World 12."

There's only so much shock value that MTV can bank in these kinds of things. I love trashy TV as much as the next person, but the abundance of skin, and the lack of any conflict or any kind of social distress in the house really sucks. Look at what MTV has been trying to sell as the conflict in the house: Frank getting caught talking about Arissa's crush on Steven. Wow. That's deep, folks.

The plotlines are shallow and all the members of the cast are single-minded seekers of domestic booty. There's no character like Julie from New Orleans, the virgin who is having difficulty coming to terms with the life her parents want her to live, or like Lindsay from Seattle, the happy, bouncy girl with the dark past dealing with the suicide of one of her best friends. Trishelle has some kind of dark relationship with her father, not much is known about anyone else's background except Alton, whose girlfriend recently had a pregnancy scare. The whole dynamic in the house is different from what its been in past seasons. There are no solid friendships forming between cast members because of the substantial amounts of sex and back-stabbing going on. You saw Frank and Steven start to form some kind of friendship in the first two episodes, as Frank confessed his crush on Trishelle to Steve on the first day. Then Steve, showing the colors of true loyalty, starts making out with Trishelle on Frank's lap.

Because of MTV's need to focus the show on sex, or perhaps making up for their bad casting decisions, the viewers are losing out. I know that my friends who are as hooked on the "Real World" as I am are just as disgusted. One of them even said, "After I watch it, I feel dirty." I agree wholeheartedly. The fact that 15 minutes of a 27-minute episode were dedicated to a drunken threesome between Brynn, Steven and Trishelle is disgusting and sad. Either the producers are really trying to instill shock value in the viewers by showing lots and lots of sex, or the characters are just that stupid and shallow. If I wanted to watch tons of sex, I'd watch Cinemax (Skinemax) or root through my roommate's porn collection.

Winners, losers and a rough fantasy season

What a strange week. The teams I love and hate all lost. I can't decide if I would prefer that or for all of them to win. Which is better? We also lost two dear friends, the St. Louis Rams and Minnesota Vikings from the 0-fer watch.

Very upsetting.

Speaking of upsetting events, my fantasy team is getting killed. What an easy way to ruin your Sunday night.

Geez Mike, took you long enough

St. Louis Head Coach Mike Martz finally got Marshall Faulk the ball, and the Rams finally won a game. Faulk, who hadn't had more than 18 rushing attempts in any of St. Louis' first five games – all losses, ran 26 times for 158 yards this week against previously unbeaten Oakland. The Rams beat the other former Los Angeles team 28-13.

Martz had been reluctant to run the ball in his team's first four games, which the Rams lost by a total 102-48. But after All-World quarterback Kurt Warner, who wasn't even All-St. Louis through last week, broke his finger, the offensive "genius" decided that he had to get the ball into the hands of Faulk, who has been called the best player in the league over each of the past four years. Amazing how long that one took to sink in.

Has anyone ever been less deserving of the title of "genius" than Mike Martz?

Warner will be out eight to 10 weeks with his broken finger, so Faulk has a slim chance of rushing for 1000 yards this season.

Finally

Speaking of the Rams win, that game also handed Oakland its first loss. I can't tell you how happy I am over this one. The Raiders will not play in the Super Bowl this year. I don't care what their record is right now (4-1), this is a team that will fall apart down the stretch. The team's age is sure to catch up with it.

On a side note, I hate the fact that Jerry Rice plays for the Raiders. Certainly the best wide receiver in league history, Rice may even be the greatest player at any position in NFL history. It's hard to give props to a Raider, but I can do it. Just don't expect me to root for them.

Can you spell defense with a 'P' and a 'U'?

When Dick Vermeil came to Kansas City prior to last season, I was an official sucker for the Chiefs. I thought that Trent Green would be the next big time quarterback and Priest Holmes would put up Marshall Faulk-type numbers. I drafted both in my fantasy draft and a few others from the offense as well.

Holmes has been terrific since then, but it took Green a year to flourish. Now he's the best quarterback in the state of Missouri. The wide receiving corps is improved this season, and tight end Tony Gonzalez is the best at his position. The offense is averaging 34.2 points per game, good for second in the American Football Conference.

So why is Kansas City 3-3? Because the Chief defense is terrible, giving up 32.2 ppg – 14th in the AFC. So, despite having one of the most lethal offenses in football, the Chiefs are at just .500, which doesn't cut it in the toughest division in football, the AFC West.

If this was college football...

Here is how my top 10 would look:

1. Miami (5-1) – This is one solid team. Big wins over New England and Denver vaults the team into the vacated number one spot this week. The Dolphins combination of mistake-free passing, excellent running and tremendous defense has to make them the early odds-on favorite to win the Super Bowl.

2. San Diego (5-1) – The Chargers young backfield of quarterback Drew Brees and LaDainian Tomlinson are going to be quite good for a long time. The defense has been impressive and this is the team that sent the defending Super Bowl champion New England Patriots into a three-game tailspin. Can't argue with any of those points.

3. Green Bay (5-1) – Big wins in the last two weeks at Chicago and New England have the Packers, my NFC Super Bowl pick, looking better than ever. Quarterback Brett Favre is simply amazing, adding to his folklore with every week that passes. Running back Ahman Green seems to be running better and the defense seems to be good enough to win now.

4. Oakland (4-1) – Finally, I can take the Raiders out of the number one spot. They fall no number four more because of my irritation with them taking the St. Louis Rams out of my 0-fer watch than any other reason. Rich Gannon and the passing game have been terrific so far, but it is Charlie Garner that has really opened eyes. Always a solid player, Garner is probably the third best running back in the NFL right now (behind Priest Holmes and Ricky Williams).

5. New Orleans (5-1) – Wins over Tampa Bay, Green Bay and Chicago were impressive in the season's first three weeks. But then the Saints lost to the Detroit Lions. The Detroit Lions. They couldn't beat the Miami Hurricanes for crying out loud. Still, I'll give the Saints a mulligan on that one, as they have won their last two games against Pittsburgh and Washington. Deuce McAllister has been terrific at the tailback spot.

6. Denver (4-2) – There are two reasons that the Broncos are this high despite having two losses. The first is that I can't penalize them for this week's loss to Miami. That was an amazing game that they should have won, but the Dolphins had just enough to pull it out – one of the best games the NFL has had in a while and it can't negate Denver's wins over the Chargers, Niners and Bills. All solid wins. The second reason is because I picked them to make the Super Bowl. Deal with it.

7. Tampa Bay (5-1) – The defense has been tough, allowing just 9.3 points per game. The offense has been good enough to win, including this week's big one over Cleveland, a quality win for the Bucs. After an overtime loss to New Orleans in Week One, Coach Jon Gruden's team has been unbeatable, outscoring opponents 123-50. This weekend's game against the Philadelphia Eagles could be a classic.

8. Indianapolis (4-1) – I did a double take when I saw the Colts sitting at 4-1. Maybe it's because they aren't in the Patriots' division any more. Maybe it's because they don't have a single quality win (I don't count Jacksonville in Week One yet). I just can't believe the Colts are 4-1 this season, but looking at the schedule, they could have slept late and still managed to win three or four. Indianapolis has beaten Jacksonville, Houston, Cincinnati and Baltimore. Well, la-dee-freakin'-da.

9. San Francisco (4-1) – The Niners fall this low because they haven't beaten a tough opponent yet, unless you consider the Giants (3-3), Redskins (2-3), Rams (1-5), and Seahawks (1-4) to be scary. I don't. Denver is the only tough opponent Coach Steve Mariucci's team has faced, which resulted in a 24-14 loss – the Niners' lone defeat of the season. This week's game against No. 5 New Orleans will tell us a lot about both teams.

10. Philadelphia (3-3) – This was a tough one. No team really deserved any recognition in this spot. The Eagles have far too much talent to be 3-3, and they are still a virtual lock to win the NFC East, so they get the nod. Having Donovan McNabb at quarterback certainly helps, too.

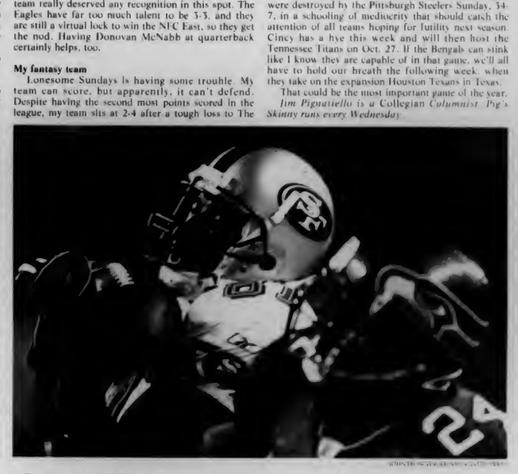
My fantasy team

Lonesome Sundays is having some trouble. My team can score, but apparently, it can't defend. Despite having the second most points scored in the league, my team sits at 2-4 after a tough loss to The Hype this weekend. My running backs looked great this weekend, as Travis Henry, Ahman Green and Priest Holmes all put up solid points, but I just can't catch a break right now.

How can you defend against another team's players?

0-fer watch

This is the most disheartening news of the weekend. Bad news folks, we have just one team to root for now, as both the Minnesota Vikings and the St. Louis Rams won this week.



The Vikes took down the equally terrible Detroit Lions, 31-24. I had a bad feeling about this one all week, as the Lions are probably the second worst team in the league, but got lucks a few weeks ago against the New Orleans Saints.

The Rams beat the self-proclaimed "best team in the NFL," Oakland Raiders, 28-13 Sunday, ending both teams' bids for perfection. Without Warner at QB, I thought the Rams would stay winless for much longer. Oh well.

Thank god for the Cincinnati Bengals. The Bungals were destroyed by the Pittsburgh Steelers Sunday, 34-7, in a schooling of mediocrity that should catch the attention of all teams hoping for futility next season. Cincy has a bye this week and will then host the Tennessee Titans on Oct. 27. If the Bengals can stink like I know they are capable of in that game, we'll all have to hold our breath the following week, when they take on the expansion Houston Texans in Texas.

That could be the most important game of the year.

Jim Pignatiello is a Collegian Columnist. Pig's Skinny runs every Wednesday.

Terrell Owens and the San Francisco 49ers placed ninth in Jim's top 10 list for the week. The Niners (4-1) have benefited from an easy schedule in the season's early going.

champion New Hampshire took ninth.

In the women's division, the dominating Boston College Eagles took first place, followed by Williams and Brown.

For the Minutemen, senior Colin Baughman finished in 78th place with a time of 25:49. Junior John Jacobson followed Baughman at 83rd , coming in at 25:53, and senior Ed Breen finished in 105th place with a time of 26:03.

Other finishers include sophomore Andy McCarron (118th, 26:10), freshman Paul Noone (128th, 26:16), junior Mike Ahearn (131st, 26:17) and freshman Sean Corbett (172nd, 26:43). Also, the men's junior varsity track team placed sixth in its division.

"The guys ran well as a team," Jacobson said. "But a lot of guys were saying that they could have run better. The field was a lot faster than last year's, which improved some of our times.

"It was weird because we practiced in hot weather, then it suddenly got cold," he continued. "Despite the rain, the team didn't have any injuries, but some soreness here and there. We have Albany this Saturday, a week off, and then it's the Atlantic 10s. I look for a lot of guys on the team to really step it up in the next few weeks."

As for the Minutewomen, junior Tricia Silva finished in 88th place in a time of 19:11. Silva was followed by senior Julie McGee, who finished in 138th place clocking in at 19:42, and junior Katie Knowles followed with a 156th place finish with a time of 19:56. Other individual places and times include freshman Emma Horton (163rd, 20:02), freshman Sherri Korlacki (188th, 20:19) and sophomore Loren Donahue (189th, 20:20).

"A lot of people stepped up for this meet," Knowles said. "For a young team we did pretty well. Overall, it was just another meet in the rain. What really wore us down was that the whole course was flat.

"Fortunately there were no injuries, considering the weather, but now we have three more weeks of practices and meets to focus on before we have to head into the Atlantic 10s."

The men and women are off until Oct. 19, when they travel to the Albany Invitational in Albany, N.Y. The meet begins at noon.

GERALD LINCOLN/COLLEGIAN

Junior Nick Kuiper took three shots (one in each period) in Sunday's loss to the Eagles. Kuiper took 44 shots in 32 games last season.

We've got guys in that situation that really aren't as confident as guys in that role as maybe BC has. That's all about self-image."

Tim Warner played the first 40 minutes in net, many times being hung out to dry by his defense, and allowed five goals on 19 shots.

"We gave up some valuable shots on Timmy," sophomore forward Tim Vitek said. "I think we sort of gave up."

Freshman Gabe Winer came in for the third period with his team down five goals and saved eight of the nine shots he faced. According to Cahoon, entering the game in that situation is much easier, as there is far less pressure on the goaltender to perform.

"That was a good prelude to him going into a game under fire."

Co-captain Tim Turner and his mates on the first line, sophomore Thomas Pock and freshman Stephen Werner, were a combined minus-seven in the game.

"We have to learn that you can't play one period in this league," Turner said. "This is one of the best leagues in the country. One period's not going to cut it."

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) – You may not prefer the kind of activity that is in store for you today, but once you commit to it, you'll surely acquit yourself quite well.

ARIES (March 21-April 19) – You may receive some important news today that you're not quite sure what to do with until one last piece of the puzzle falls into place.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) – You're in no mood to have things go wrong today. If you have failed to prepare, you'd better be ready to do some quick-fix work!

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) – A dream come true may not be so much fun as dreaming it in the first place. Today, you're going to have to decide whether to continue your "pursuit."

CANCER (June 21-July 22) – A little people-watching can serve you well today. You'll get a few valuable ideas and increase your own confidence through comparison.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) – Give yourself – and others – the benefit of the doubt today. Nothing is likely to be "perfect," and there are many appropriate ways to believe.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) – You may be blessed with an unexpected inspiration toward mid-day. Enlightenment will enable you to fulfill someone else's high expectations.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) – You're not going to want to disappoint a family member who has been counting on you for some time. Today, do what you must to fulfill a promise.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) – You don't want to take time doing those "little things" that have become second nature. Jump right to the important stuff and make a loved one happy.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) – Your mind is off and running, but your heart may be lagging behind. Take care that you're not actually trying to deceive yourself.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) – You know what you are about, so why do you have so much difficulty explaining yourself to others? Why do you lack confidence?

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) – You may be far more demonstrative with your feelings than usual. Others may not fully understand what you are trying to communicate.

Minutemen show inexperience

By Matt Brady
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

For the first 10 minutes, it looked like Sunday's contest between the Massachusetts hockey team and Boston College would be a hard fought affair between two teams looking to start off the year by picking up a pair of points in conference play. It was not to be, however, as the Eagles built a 4-0 lead and cruised to a 6-1 victory over the Minutemen.

Boston College	6
UMass	1

The Eagles (1-0, 1-0) put the Minutemen (0-1, 0-1) in their place early, but the Minutemen were hanging tough and playing beat for beat with their opponents.

That changed in a hurry, however, as a turn for the worse for the Maroon and White BC completely dominated play the rest of the way and returned to Chestnut Hill with a comfortable victory over the Minutemen.

"I thought it was a good solid game for us this morning," BC Head Coach Jerry York said. "I thought both teams were very sharp and played a big game. In the end, some of the game I thought Jimmy Kelleher was very solid in goal. That about sums it up."

I think we're really happy the way we played the first 10 minutes," UMass Head Coach Don Cahoon said. "We looked like we were fairly organized, like we were ready to compete. I'd like to think we started off playing well.

"It's very frustrating when you start the season and you say, 'I know these kids worked hard, I think that they were prepared,'" he continued. "There are other obstacles that we have to overcome and get them to play as well as they can. Having said that, you still might not win the game against a program like this, but you're certainly not going to lose a game six-love."

The Eagles went three-for-seven on the power play, putting 11 shots on net on the man advantage. Highly touted freshman Patrick Eaves notched two goals, one on the power play, in his first college outing while playing on a high-octane line with brother Ben Eaves (0g, 2a) and last year's scoring leader for the Eagles, Tony Voce (1g, 1a).

"I came into this year kind of knowing what college hockey was going to be like," the younger Eaves said. "Ben and Tom have made it really easy on me. They've let me adjust well. I'm very fortunate to be on their line, and hopefully we can keep pushing on and helping the team win."

His coach and teammates were duly impressed with the former U.S. National Development Team member's first collegiate effort.

"It was great to see a freshman start us off with two goals right off the bat," Kelleher said. "We'll be looking toward Pat for a big season. I think he stepped up in the first game of the season on the road."

The Eagles also shed all questions about being top-heavy in terms of scoring, as all four lines scored goals on the evening.

"That's a good indication of our ability to go deeper on our bench this year," York said. "We're using more players this year, so we can stay fresher and we'll be stronger as the game progresses."

Kelleher, a senior who will be splitting goaltending duties with sophomore Matti Kaltiainen between the pipes this year, was equally impressive backstopping the Eagles, making 20 saves – including a stellar toe-stop on UMass sophomore Greg Mauldin in the second period.

"It was a pretty good game," Kelleher said. "From my point of view, I saw all 20 shots they had, they might have had one or two rebounds. It wasn't that tough of a game for me since I saw every puck. Our D cleared everyone out – they played well."

For Cahoon, whose team was far from adept at scoring last season, the inability of his team to capitalize on its man-up opportunities sealed the squad's fate.

"The game was all about power plays," he said. "They got their opportunities, they capitalized. We got a few opportunities eventually and really looked inept.

Sophomore goalie Tim Warner allowed five goals on 14 shots in 40 minutes of play Sunday against BC. No. 30 gave up an average of 5.16 goals per game in 10 games played last season.

A rare conference defeat

Nineteen game A-10 winning streak broken

By Todd Foster
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

During an era known to fans of great sports, but rarely, Minutemen sports has been the best in the Atlantic 10 over the past decade, but hasn't won yet [illegible]. Riding a 19-game winning streak in the A-10, its conference opponents see a huge hole open on the backs of Minutewomen.

One A-10 opponents now see the door open, and I've tried to put [illegible] in four opponents [illegible]," Head Coach Patty Shea said. "Last year when we were the dominating team and they were winless, what did you think?"

So that's exactly what teams are thinking about is. They know that UMass is out there now."

Friday night, UMass hosted its first A-10 opponent, Richmond, at Richard F. Garber Field. After an intense game, the Minutewomen fell to the Spiders, 4-1. The Maroon and White's loss gives the team a record of 0-13 for the first time in the history of the program.

Richmond improves to 7-6 for the season.

Neither team gave an inch through the first 15 minutes, which was nothing but a possession battle. When playing conference opponents, the game has a different meaning. With the A-10 as your ticket to the NCAA Tournament, every conference game is a must-win.

"It's your true season and that's your way into the NCAA Tournament," Shea said. "What you did before this doesn't really matter, not at all. There are so many rivalries and UMass isn't a well-loved team in any sport. Nobody loves a winner."

Richmond took advantage of every corner it got by getting a good shot on net every time. The first corner was a blast that junior goalkeeper Ashley Egland made a quick kick save on. The second corner had a different result as the Spiders' Sarah Adams fired a shot from the top of the circle past Egland at the 23:06 mark.

Less than three minutes later, the Maroon and White saw itself in the same position. Adams found Michelle La Force taking a banana shot that barely slipped over an outstretched Egland.

With only three minutes remaining before halftime, Richmond again took advantage on its last corner of the half. Adams, who was no doubt the star of the game, found the corner of the box to give Richmond a 3-0 lead going into halftime. Adams had five points on the day, on two goals and an assist.

"They had a great shot on net," Shea said.

Three of the four Richmond goals came off corners, which is an area that UMass has been giving up a lot of ground in. In the first half, the defense allowed seven corners and six shots on Egland. As for the Minutewomen, they were only allowed one corner and couldn't get a single shot on net in the opening half.

"The corner is designed to give the offense a huge advantage, and your defense starts with your front line," Shea said. "You are asking a young defense to scramble. They just had some great corners today."

As in recent games, UMass dominated the second half by controlling the ball and playing tougher defense. The Minutewoman defense only gave up one shot on net and one corner in the second frame.

The one Richmond shot on net in the second half, however, was the nicest goal of the day. Richmond's Michelle Yuppa took a feed from Brittney Parrish and streaked to the center of the field. While streaking, Yuppa got tangled up in the defense and started to fall to the ground. As she was falling, she managed to get off a quick back-hander that zipped in the lower right corner only seven minutes into the half.

The Maroon and White quickly answered when senior Sarah Bohonowicz fired a shot on net that was deflected in by freshman Jaime Bawden to get UMass on the board. Bawden leads the team in goals with three, and is tied with Bohonowicz for the lead in points with six.

Another fact not seen on the stat sheets is lucky breaks. UMass wasn't blessed with good fortune against Richmond, as it had many near goals just barely go wide of the boxes, and the Minutewomen received some tough calls in the game.

"We haven't learned to lose yet because we have such a great group of winners here," said Shea, a member of the '81 NCAA runner-up. "There are just certain things we need to do to be more successful."

The Minutewomen fell behind 3-0 in the first half of Friday's 4-1 loss to Richmond. UMass has held the lead at halftime just once this season, a 3-2 loss to Ohio on Sept. 22.

UMPD arrests six

Dan Lamothe
COLLEGIAN STAFF

University of Massachusetts Police and Amherst Police apprehended six people yesterday related to UMass yesterday, including all four individuals involved in the unarmed robbery and assault and battery of an elderly woman in Amherst center and a student at a bus stop on Oct. 9.

"It was a good joint effort by both departments to get these guys," UMPD spokesperson Jim Lyons said.

Police identified and arrested Norman Vazquez, 18, of Holyoke, Samuel Acevedo-Nichols, 19, of Amherst, Ermin Omerovic, of Amherst, and a 17-year-old male from Belchertown. All four were charged with unarmed robbery and with assault and battery. In addition, Vazquez and Acevedo-Nichols were charged with trespassing, due to previous incidents on campus.

According to Lyons, Omerovic was apprehended at 12:29 p.m. yesterday at the Worcester Dining Common. The location of the other arrests was not clear at press time.

According to UMPD, the assaulted student was attacked and robbed at the PVTA bus stop on President's Drive at the Fine Arts Center on Oct. 9. The student was waiting for the bus between 8:45 and 9:00 p.m.

One of the men struck him in the face with his fist and the four men took his backpack. Most of the property in the backpack was recovered. The student was treated for his injuries and released from Cooley-Dickinson Hospital in Northampton.

Just a few minutes before, at the Unitarian church in Amherst center, the elderly woman was attacked. According to Sgt. Ronald Young of the Amherst Police, four men with descriptions matching those of the assailants in the UMass attack knocked down the woman, 66, and stole her purse. The incident was reported at 8:28 p.m.

Police also arrested Jon I. Wiinikka, 21, of Hubardston, Mass., yesterday in his dormitory room in John Quincy Adams. Police searched his room with a warrant at 7:19 a.m. and found a large amount of marijuana in small sandwich bags, as well as drug paraphernalia and an undisclosed amount of cash. Wiinikka was charged with possession of a class D substance with intent to distribute.

The final arrest recorded yesterday was in Fernald Hall at around 3 p.m. UMPD forces arrested Efstathi Casternopoulos, 21, of Brighton, Mass., on a warrant issued by the Springfield Police Department for undisclosed charges. Casternopoulos was bailed for court today in Springfield.

Food Bank holds fundraiser today

Piece of the Pie day, the Food Bank's oldest and most popular fundraiser, is running today. Piece of the Pie day is an event to raise money to fight hunger in Western Massachusetts.

180 restaurants across Western Massachusetts will participate, including 27 Amherst restaurants. Ten percent of the restaurant's earnings for the day will go to the Food Bank of Western Massachusetts.

Each dollar raised for The Food Bank can be turned into $9 of healthy, nutritious food for people in need of assistance.

"This is our fourteenth year doing Piece of the Pie in the Pioneer Valley and our third year in Berkshire County," said David Sharken, Food Bank Executive Director.

"Unfortunately, the food pantries and other agencies we serve have seen a significant increase in the number of people coming to them for assistance over the past year – particularly the working poor – and this trend doesn't show any signs of slowing down," said Sharken.

People in Berkshire, Franklin, Hampshire and Hampden Counties are encouraged to enjoy their meals at one of the participating restaurants or get a take-out meal.

"With the slow economy, it's more important than ever for folks to help us raise funds to meet the growing need for assistance," said Sharken.

"Working families are having to choose between keeping up with their bills and buying food for their children – it's a position no one should be put in," said Sharken.

Piece of the Pie 2002 is sponsored by Lightlife Foods, a maker of vegetarian products, The Valley Advocate, WWLP Channel 22, Health New England, The Berkshire Eagle, Lamar Outdoor Advertising and Callahan Outdoor Advertising.

All proceeds from this event will go to benefit The Food Bank.

The Food Bank works behind nearly every agency that provides food to people in need in the western Massachusetts area.

Each year over 6 million pounds of food are distributed to 420 social programs that work to serve those in need.

"This year we will distribute seven million pounds of food to over 100,000 people, almost half of which are children," Sharken said.

Drive for lives

JAMES SCHAFFER/COLLEGIAN

Due to her past history with leukemia, Liz Brainerd, a sophomore at UMass, participates in yesterday's bone marrow drive in the campus center. Samples will be put into the national bone marrow registry.

By Matt Casey
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

The Alpha Epsilon Pi fraternity, along with Koach, a college outreach program, and the Hillel House held a bone marrow registry drive yesterday in the Campus Center. Samples taken from the drive will be placed into the national bone marrow registry to be used for matching sufferers of leukemia and other bone marrow diseases to possible donors outside of their families.

"We're just trying to get as many people as possible into the registry, so it will be easier to find a match," said Jillian Marcus, Chair of the Tzedek committee through Hillel.

Marcus said that the drive could only register about 300 people due to available time and resources.

No bone marrow was actually donated at the drive. Each donor's blood profile is put into the national registry. There, doctors will check their patient's profile against those in the registry. When one is found, they are contacted and then can choose whether or not they wish to go through the process of donating marrow to the patient.

"[It was] very simple and painless – much quicker then I thought it would be," said junior Robyn Brooks.

"It's very quick," said Dan Klein, vice president of AEPi.

The bone marrow registry requires a large number of people because of how exact the match between a donor and receiver must be.

"It's harder to match bone marrow than blood type," said Nick Connor, a student at UMass and a leukemia survivor. Connor said that to give someone blood, all that is required to match is the right one of eight different blood types.

In the case of bone marrow, however, not only does blood type need to match, donor and receiver genetics need to be very close. This is measured by a system of six genetic markers. The genetic balance is so delicate that people of different ethnicity typically cannot give blood to one another. If the match is not adequate, then the receiver's body will reject the injected marrow. This is known as graft versus host disease.

One of the main goals of this and other drives is to attract minority donors. "Something like 75 percent of donors are white males," said Connor. "Minorities are under represented."

Excluding drives, the test to become a donor is "something like 75 dollars," Connor said. However, the Red Cross is desperate for minority donors and will reduce or waive the fee.

Bone marrow transplants are necessary for people with leukemia. "The bone marrow produces bad white blood cells," Connor said.

To remedy the situation, doctors inject new marrow into a victim's bones after killing their original bone marrow with radiation and or chemotherapy. To prevent graft versus host disease, doctors weaken your body's natural defense. "They kill your immune system," Connor said.

Donations were made with the knowledge that it could eventually lead to helping someone like Nick Connor, who appears to be in perfect health now, two years after his ordeal.

"I was lucky," he said. "My leukemia was a best-case scenario."

President Bush signs a resolution authorizing the use of force against Iraq, Wednesday, Oct. 16, 2002, in the East Room of the White House. Bush summoned dozens of lawmakers to the White House to formally accept Congress' go-ahead for military action against Iraq, hoping that a tableau of a unified America would help win over hesitant allies.

Signing brings debate

By Jennifer Loven
ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON (AP) – President Bush on Wednesday signed Congress' war-making resolution and told wary world leaders to "face up to our global responsibilities" to confront Saddam Hussein.

"Those who choose to live in denial may eventually be forced to live in fear," Bush said as the United Nations began a bitter debate over his plans to disarm and oust Saddam. "Every nation that shares in the benefits of peace also shares in the duty of defending the peace."

With dozens of lawmakers from both parties on hand for the East Room signing ceremony, Bush used his speech – and Friday's strong congressional vote – to press the U.N. to adopt a new resolution compelling Iraq to submit to unconditional weapons inspections.

"We will defend our nation and lead others in defending the peace," the president said.

Though he said military action would be his last resort, Bush left little room for Saddam to avoid confrontation. "Our goal is to fully and finally remove a real threat to world peace and to America," he said.

The U.N. Security Council on Wednesday started its first day of open debate on Iraq at the behest of the dozens of non-Security Council nations who oppose an attack on Baghdad. The debate is mostly designed to take the administration to task on its Iraq policies, and White House officials expected sharp criticism throughout the day.

Even as Bush spoke, Russia's deputy foreign minister said the United States' proposed resolution is unacceptable, while a two-step proposal from France is closer to the Kremlin's stance. Both nations hold veto power in Security Council.

"The American variant of the resolution on Iraq has not undergone changes. It is unacceptable and Russia cannot support it," Yuri Fedotov said, according to the news agency Interfax.

However, the French proposal contains "many positions that Russia shares," Fedotov was quoted as saying.

As if in reply, Bush said, "The time has arrived once again for the United Nations to live up to the purposes of its founding — to protect our common security. The time has arrived once again for free nations to face up to our global responsibilities and confront a gathering danger."

"They don't have forever and the president is mindful of that," White House press

SGA proposes a new public safety committee

By Kristin Shrewsbury

The Senate Executive Committee discusses public safety issues at yesterday's Student Government Association meeting. The Senate committee was the Senate wanted it because it important and then want it done right," Saunders said. "I'm confident that the Senate wants this motion to be done right."

Fatemi agreed with Saunders, explaining that she was disappointed the motion was not placed on the agenda, but that it would not deter her work in public safety.

"I'm very disappointed but this won't hinder our efforts," Fatemi said. "A lot of people want to get involved and the more help we have with this the better."

Other motions discussed were the allocation of $2025 to SCERA (Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy) for payroll purposes. Due to a glitch in last years fiscal budget the money was allocated, however it failed to be switched into SCERA's budget.

The motion allocated the funding to be placed within their current budget from SGA's finance reserves. This motion passed unanimously by the Senate.

secretary Ari Fleischer said.

Bush, who received a standing ovation as he signed the resolution from the roughly 100 lawmakers in the audience, said, "This nation will not live at the mercy of an foreign power or plot."

Flanked by Vice President Dick Cheney and Secretary of State Colin Powell, the president was joined on stage by 11 lawmakers, including Senator Joe Lieberman, D-Conn., John McCain, R-Ariz., Joe Biden, D-Del., minority leader Trent Lott, R-Miss., and John Warner, R-Va., and House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill.

Notic eably absent was Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle, D-S.D., whose granddaughter was born early Wednesday and had a schedule was packed with legislative and political business.

House Minority Leader Dick Gephardt, D-Mo., who helped negotiate the resolution and provided Bush with welcome Democrats support at a White House appearance before the vote, also did not attend. Gephardt's travel schedule kept him away a day after he ratcheted up his strong criticism of the Bush administration and Republicans on the economy.

Hesscher said both Democratic leaders had been invited as had all lawmakers who supported the resolution.

In a major victory for the president in weeks of back-and-forth between Congress and the White House, pitched little significant change in Bush's initial draft of the resolution. The measure giving Bush the authority to use military force, if necessary, to rid Iraq of its biological and chemical weapons and disband its nuclear weapons program was approved Friday.

The resolution requires the president to notify Congress, before or within 48 hours after an attack, that further diplomatic approaches would not have protected U.S. security and to explain to Congress how the military action will not hurt the war on terror. But it allows Bush to take unilateral action regardless of U.N. activities.

Just seven Republican lawmakers — six in the House and one in the Senate — opposed the resolution, while nearly half the congressional Democrats were unwilling to give Bush such open-ended war-making authority and voted no.

The resolution passed the House by a 296-133 margin and by a 77-23 margin in the Senate. But passage came with entreaties by lawmakers from both parties for Bush to exhaust all diplomatic efforts before using military force.

The Bush administration had hoped the congressional action would fortify the U.S.- and British-backed effort at the United Nations. France, Russia and China, the Security Council's other veto-capable permanent members, remain opposed to a resolution authorizing military action if it refuses to cooperate with inspectors. France has preferred a separate resolution to be debated afterward.

In his speech, Bush spelled out several ways Saddam has avoided compliance with U.N. resolutions on weapons of mass destruction and made it clear his patience was running out.

"I have not ordered use of force. I hope the use of force will not become necessary. Yet, confronting the threat posed by Iraq is necessary by whatever means that requires," he said.

Taking action

"Kristin's Story" told in Union

By Michael Fleming
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

"Encourage action" was the message guest speaker Andrea Cooper left with the audience in the Student Union last night. Cooper was presenting "Kristin's Story," the awakening talk about rape and suicide she has been delivering to college students nationwide.

Alpha Chi Omega has been preparing the event since last March. Kelly Cobb organized the effort to solicit a grant from the national sorority to bring Cooper here to give her talk, which Cobb cited as being somewhat prompted by rapes on campus. "In a sense it was because of rapes here, but it's more important for awareness and prevention now," Cobb said. The Everywoman's Center, who handed out awareness pamphlets, helped organize the event as well.

As expected, the turnout was large with little social constraint. Not only was the Greek community well represented, but also a good number of men and women who filtered in from the five-college area.

The lure of Cooper's speech was evident immediately as she introduced her daughter's life in a way that introduced Kristin to all the listeners. Speaking with a soft Southern accent, she soon had everyone nodding in agreement about the haunting same are subject to in high school, boyfriends' inexperience with giving satisfactory gifts and various other quirks of both high school and college life.

The transition to her daughter's rape and her ensuing depression was sudden but the tone remained steady. It began with the discovery of Kristin's body by Andrea on New Year's Eve of 1995. Although she first construed the scene as alcohol poisoning, Kristin's journal later revealed otherwise.

After learning of the rape, "I was like a woman possessed" she recalled. It was along her quest, after talking to Kristin's college friends, that she learned how urgent the need for education on rape, depression and suicide is.

Educating the audience more about the symptoms of depression with each line she delivered, she retold the remainder of Kristin's life after the rape. Her grades dropped dramatically, she found no fun in going out with friends or partying, and most drastically, Andrea joked, "She didn't have fun shopping anymore."

Cooper also emphasized the lack of action when certain friends noticed Kristin's depression. Some were even told directly about the rape.

Despite them urging her to get counseling, she did little to deal with the problem and spoke candidly only in her journal, from which several poignant excerpts were shared. "One thing I got from her journal and from other women I've spoken to," Cooper said, "Is, 'I couldn't tell my parents because my mom would flip and my dad would kill the guy'." Many in the crowd concurred.

It was ultimately the lack of action that kept the path to suicide open for Kristin, and this was where Andrea was most emphatic. "Do something, talk to her, offer to let her stay at your place, get her a counselor."

Emphasized further was the alarming closeness of rape and depression with college students. One in four college women are raped, especially in the 'Red Zone' of freshman year. Other statistics Cooper laced her speech with included the 85 percent of raped women who were victimized by a close acquaintance, the 46 percent who remain silent, and the 75 percent of incidents prompted by alcohol.

"I was not able to help Kristin, but I hope I was able to help someone in this room tonight," Cooper said.

Cooper also reminded everyone of 1-800-656-HOPE, a rape hotline; www.911rape.org and 1-800-784-2433, a suicide hotline, as some resources available for students.

Andrea Cooper presents "Kristin's Story," a discussion about rape and suicide yesterday in the Student Union ballroom.

More witnesses confirm fleeing sniper

By Allen G. Breed
ASSOCIATED PRESS

ROCKVILLE, Md. (AP) – For the first time since the Washington-area sniper shootings began, more than one witness saw a man fire and flee in a white van, but investigators said Wednesday that the accounts from the latest slaying weren't clear enough to produce a sketch.

"There are a couple of people who believe they saw a man shoot, unfortunately distance and darkness and perhaps adrenaline have made them unable to give a clear composite that we can disseminate," said Montgomery County Police Capt. Nancy Demme.

Demme said one witness told police the shooter used an AK-74 rifle to kill 47-year-old FBI analyst Linda Franklin on Monday night outside a Falls Church, Va., Home Depot store. Police said the weapon can fire the .223-caliber round recovered from some of the shooting scenes.

"The witness firmly believes this is the weapon," Demme said. "But we have to keep in mind that weapons are interchangeable, like vehicles."

Investigators said the latest shooting has yielded the most detailed clues yet in the search for the killer, including license plate information and a description of a man seen leaving the scene in a white, Chevy Astro van with a burned-out or broken left tail light.

But the witness reports of the shooter – some of which described the suspect as dark-skinned or Middle Eastern – were not consistent.

"The only common denominator thus far is male," Demme said. "We don't have a refined description to go by. I know that's not what the public wants to hear."

The latest setback came two weeks into the investigation into 11 shootings in Maryland, Virginia and Washington that have killed nine people and wounded two.

With police unable to release more specific information, Demme gave a "how-to" list of tips for potential witnesses in case the sniper strikes again. Among them: commit to memory what you see, carry around a pen to make notes and, if necessary, write down descriptions and details on your hand. She also warned witnesses not to "contaminate" their remembrances by talking to other people or reporters.

Robert Young, a Washington construction worker, was among witnesses to Monday night's shooting who returned to the shopping center Tuesday to talk with police. He said he heard a muffled gunshot and saw a white van.

Young said as he backed his truck out of his parking spot, a white Astro van with two men inside tried to turn into his lane. He said the driver appeared very agitated to find his way blocked and instead drove by a neighboring restaurant and out of sight.

Young described the driver as a short man of slight build who appeared to be Middle Eastern. "I got a good look at the guy," he said.

The driver "seemed to be excessively irritated because he couldn't pull into my lane," he said. "I thought this fool was going to want to get out of the van and duke or something. But he didn't. He kept on going."

Law enforcement sources told The Associated Press there was no indication the sniper targeted Franklin, 47, because of her job with the FBI's Cyber Crimes Division, created last year to focus on computer crimes as well as intellectual property cases.

With the terrifying spree 2 weeks old, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld agreed Tuesday evening to provide military surveillance aircraft in the hunt for the killer, a Pentagon spokesman said. Sources said federal agents on the plane will relay any information they collect to authorities on the ground.

The Army also is searching its records for people with sniper training.

In a continuing appeal for the public's help, Moose released a composite image of a white Astro with a ladder rack that witnesses saw after Friday's slaying of a man at a gas station near Fredericksburg, Va. He also released a similar image of a Ford Econovan.

Moose said there appeared to be similarities between the van seen at Friday's shooting and the van from Monday night's attack. Fairfax County Police Chief Tom Manger would not say whether witnesses to the latest attack were able to give complete license plate numbers to investigators.

"Each shooting has revealed more to this investigation. We're encouraged every day," said Michael Bouchard, an agent with the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms.

UW professor speaks about global warming

Nationally known chemist Bassam Shakhashiri, a professor of chemistry at the University of Wisconsin-Madison, will speak about global warming this afternoon at 4 p.m. in Peters Auditorium in Goessmann Laboratory.

Shakhashiri is known across the nation for his chemical demonstrations in lecture rooms and laboratories, as well as in informal settings such as convention centers, shopping malls and retirement homes. He has been a guest on many different TV and radio talk shows across the country, including the Larry Meiller Show on the Ideas Network of Wisconsin Public Radio. Shakhashiri has been featured in newspapers, magazines and national and local radio and television outlets, including The New York Times, The Washington Post, Newsweek, Time, NBC Nightly News, CNN, and The Larry King Show.

Shakhashiri has a reputation for putting on shows that demonstrate that "science is fun" and attempts to inspire young people to pursue further careers as researchers, entrepreneurs, and teachers, whom he believes the nation's continuing economic health and national security will depend on. More importantly, he advocates the achievement of literacy in science, mathematics, and technology among those who choose other fields.

A native of Lebanon, Shakhashiri came to the United States in 1957 at the age of 18 with only one year of college behind him from the American University of Beirut. He went on to complete his undergraduate work at Boston University, and earned his Ph.D. degree in chemistry at the University of Maryland. He spent a year doing post-doctoral research and two as a junior member of the chemistry faculty at the University of Illinois, Urbana before he joined the faculty of the University of Wisconsin in 1970, where he has resided ever since.

Shakhashiri is a member of many scientific and educational organizations including the American Chemical Society, and has received many prestigious awards and appointments, such as being elected a fellow of the American Association for the Advancement of Science in recognition of his scientific and educational achievements. He is nationally recognized as a leader in the teaching of science and chemistry and has made many honorary contributions to the scientific world.

The gubernatorial race:

time to drop the antics

The deadline to register to vote in the November 5 state elections came and went virtually unnoticed yesterday, a small detail in a gubernatorial race picking up steam and intrigue as the march to the finish line draws closer to a tangible end.

One announcement in particular dominated both local media coverage and discussion among those political parties vying for public support and sentiment in attempts to gain ground in the race for governor.

Democratic gubernatorial candidate Shannon O'Brien, who in the most recent poll leads Republican candidate Mitt Romney by an approximate six percent margin, announced from the steps of Old City Hall yesterday that she, if elected, would support gay marriages in Massachusetts if such a bill were to cross her desk. Flanked by some two-dozen gay and lesbian political leaders, O'Brien also expressed caution and attached a sense of reality to her remarks.

"I would support a marriage piece of legislation, but I think that the fight needs to focus on civil unions because I think it is one that we can win," said O'Brien.

The remarks have, of course, come under fire. When O'Brien entered the race, she told The Boston Globe that she was opposed to gay marriages; a later endorsement by then-candidate Robert Reich, also a Democrat, before the primaries may have sparked her thought process in a different direction. It's not uncommon for any candidate to spring back and forth between platforms; that, however, doesn't make it any more reassuring.

If this is indeed a decision that O'Brien has arrived at of her own accord, and for reasons more substantial than a stronger political foothold, then we at The Collegian stand behind her movement to push ahead a more forward line of thought.

What we don't support are the petty personal attacks that result from such an announcement. O'Brien packaged with her proclamation yesterday a set of accusations aimed squarely at Romney, whom she said was trying to "mask a very conservative set of belief systems" on gay rights and related issues.

The Romney campaign fired back, and the arguments has since been volleyed back and forth a number of times, each time relying on more personal and irrelevant points as energy. What ensues is not a democratic process, but rather a self-serving one that all but shuts out the largest and most important variable:

We, the people, with the right to vote.

O'Brien's interests, in their most basic form, offer a refreshing perspective, and finally, a choice. So often races boil down to two candidates who are carbon copies of one another; here, we have one before us that continues to split down a moral and political middle. As long as they drop the childish tactics and focus on the relevant topics that continue to define them as candidates, a legitimate race may fall into our collective hands.

Hussein wins... or does he?

ELDRIDGE

Iraqi president Saddam Hussein total victory.

This is not a column about war nor is it a column about Bush versus Hussein, this is a column about logistics and the exploitation of "democracy."

According to Iraqi officials 100 percent of the voting population put their trust in Saddam as president for the next seven years.

Hussein was the only candidate on the ballot.

So there was never any doubt that Hussein would win the election. Even if he was the only one to submit a ballot, he was his own opposition, and would win based on that one vote.

The hard to swallow part about this election is that reports have been surfacing over the past few weeks that Iraqi citizens are not backing their leader wholeheartedly.

Ari Fleischer, White House press secretary, has made the not-to-subtle reference that Iraqi assassins are somewhat available to oust the despot. Of course Fleischer rescinded his remarks shortly thereafter, saying that the White House had no official policy on ousting the leader.

Back to Iraq. So Hussein gained 100 percent of the 11,445,638 eligible voters.

This is impressive, seeing as the United States can't even manage a 50 percent voter turnout. At the same time this is very skeptical. VERY skeptical, and here's why.

One, the population dispersion in Iraq is wide and varied. Baghdad, the capital city, probably houses the most voters. This is safe to say.

But the population extends to the deserts, to the more rugged and rural terrain. To accurately gather information from these areas would take some time, longer than the one day the results were tallied and reported in.

Another factor is that the Kurd population, while not under the control of Hussein, is strongly opposed to the regime. With 94.5 percent of the group stating that they would not vote for the dictator, it is hard to imagine there aren't more Iraqis who would abstain from issuing a yes vote.

The victors of Saddam Hussein has also been used as a rebuttal to statements from the Bush administration that Iraqi citizens are unhappy with their leader.

It is possible that there is a group of happy citizens, people who are satisfied with Hussein and his strong-armed regime. It is not likely the whole country, the whole group of eligible voters, is in this group of satisfied voters.

And the leadership is claiming Saddam's victory "is a unique manifestation of democracy which is superior to all other forms of democracies even in these countries which are besieging Iraq and trying to suffocate it."

This from Izzat Ibrahim, vice chairman of the Revolutionary Command Council in Iraq, insinuating opposition to the United States, a not so hidden agenda item on the Iraqi platter.

Considering what Iraq is defining as democracy, one wonders what their description of voting is. It goes far beyond the "hanging chads" of Florida.

There shouldn't be, but maybe there is, a system where no vote counts as a "yes" vote, but this is not what people are saying happened.

Iraqi officials are heralding that all eligible voters cast ballots. This certainly implies that the polling places were visited by the voters, that the ballots were filled out, and placed in the boxes.

It is implied that the ballots were all appropriately filled out – shouldn't be too hard to pick a candidate. It infers that there were no lost ballots, a truly American quality. And it infers that in one day 11the elections being Tuesday) 11,445,638 ballots were counted, tallied and reported as affirmative votes for Saddam.

Take this victory with a grain of salt. Take the election that preceded it with a grain of salt. This is not to say it is time to upset the regime, oust the dictator and start a war with Iraq.

This is about democracy. Even if Tuesday's election was a victory for Saddam, it was not a victory for democracy, and apparently not a victory for Iraq.

War, oil and deception

On Oct. 7 George W. Bush had addressed the nation concerning one of our greatest national pastimes: War. This year, the locals' country will be ... (drum roll) ... Iraq. As usual, he had a lot of nasty things to say about Saddam (who hasn't?) but once again, his speech, on the state of affairs, came up shorter than a forty-five year-old John Holmes. He said nothing new; just another Texan-American Idealist Pep-Rally for radically bustaglio Republicans and military personnel, if any distinction can be made between the two.

Even more amazingly, intelligence officials, saying that Bush had used "cooked information" in his speech to the American people, shot down the statements that he made in his Cincinnati address. One insider even said that "the flow of intelligence has been skewed by hawks at the Pentagon."

It's a classic media trick to make flimsy yet powerful statements using the authority of perhaps the Presidency, and by the time someone comes around to debunking these statements, the audience has already shut its ears off. Even though there are a lot of minds made up about this war, I would like to offer my critique of a speech made by a man who I believe has gone to wild ends to not only insult the intelligence and common sense of the American people, but to dupe them on a matter of life and death.

Bush had accused Saddam of driving "toward an arsenal of terror." Well, let's assume that he is. If he actually develops "a nuclear weapon to blackmail the world," he would be kept in check by America's very own "arsenal of terror," which is capable of blackmailing the world ten times over. Don't worry, America nobody will come for your microwave burritos and nobody will try and make you wear a turban. We have an old way of doing things around here. We call it MAD ("Mutually Assured Destruction) and this policy was what kept Russia (whom we eventually made peace with) and the U.S. from killing each other in the past. I think that Junior is going to have to get used to the fact that we are not the only country with these kinds of weapons.

Is it that America can no longer handle playing the game that it started in August of 1945? We created the game of nuclear diplomacy and now we want to start setting double standards for other countries? Are we afraid they may attack us? Why is that? Could it be because of somebody's drive for military supremacy and preemptive strike doctrine, as written in the 2002 National Security Strategy? Hmm. If you were another country, you wouldn't be suspicious?

Another claim: Iraq "possesses and produces chemical and biological weapons." But what Junior forgot to mention was that his administration – earlier this year, had accused Cuba of the same thing. Would you care to bring that up again, Mr. President? Please, enlighten me. How come you didn't mention it in your freedom-driven rant to the Miami-Cubans? Maybe it was because you had "nada" to back yourself up with. The "Bio-terrorism Facility" that you claimed U.S. Intelligence had found turned out to be a medical center that was distributing medicine to third world countries. So, maybe you should think twice about buying into your inane aerial photographs of Iraqi installations that you found under your 10s trucks.

Bush also tried to gain support by saying that the regime celebrated the attacks of 9/11. "Sleven," as my circle calls it. So with this new mentality, should we go around and bomb every country that celebrated "Sleven?" Hails Jihad, Batman! That's a lot of countries! Let me mention that America has never been too nice as to not celebrate somebody else's demise either. Forty-five years ago, we'd be dancing in the streets to see a mushroom cloud over Moscow, and twelve years ago, we were watching the Gulf War like it was the Super Bowl. Have we suddenly become tasteful and sensitive as a nation? Don't flatter yourselves.

"High-strength aluminum tubes" were another concern for our president. Apparently, you can use these gizmos in nuclear manufacturing to "enrich uranium in a gas centrifuge." Junior stops to catch his breath. Bush claimed that the Iraqi leader had made attempts to purchase them for this reason. However, U.S. intelligence had said they were likely to be only used for conventional weapons. Does our president's technologically inclined friend account for any other uses for aluminum tubing? If Rick James and Marion Barry can come up with some colorful ideas, I'm sure Bush can. Can we come to a conclusion on whether they are building nukes or fixing a 1987 Chevy Beretta? Not with our evidence.

Colin L. Baracus ever detected to Iraq, he could enrich uranium with a screwdriver, three refrigerator magnets, a broken light bulb and an empty toilet-paper roll. Considering that Saddam has these things, we should go and stop him...or just arrest Mr. T as an "enemy combatant."

The reactions toward Bush's Oct. 7 address show that even within the higher levels of our government, people are starting to acknowledge the slimy methods of this administration's campaign of disinformation. To me, there is no doubt that the Bush Administration is playing on our nation's fears and newfound sense of vulnerability to its own ends of power and savage profiteering. They hide, exaggerate, offer outright false information and stonewall truth to the masses; a truth which could help make one of the most detrimental decisions that we as a nation will have to live with. Are we justified in sending our girlfriends and boyfriends, wives and husbands, and mommies and daddies off to a war that further risks the National Security of the United States, over what may be just for oil and influence for a few?

The people of America need to think long and hard and search all avenues of truth on this matter, but when your leaders engage in this sort of campaign, they restrict the avenues of truth and threaten the right to think for all of us. Remember: a nation, that has given up its right to think, has passed this right onto somebody that will think for all of them, regardless of their best interests, and Bush knows this very well. My mind is made up about the war, but I'm not telling you to go and protest or support anything, just to think a little bit. I don't see any of Junior's supporters scurrying to the enlistment office.

Letters to the Editor:

To the Editor:

I found Richard Graham's irrational and unoriginal commentary on the 'inevitable' war with Iraq to be very unsettling, though unfortunately typical.

The first thing one notices about this letter is the anger of the speaker, as he disrespectfully writes off anti-war movement in Amherst as "a bunch of hippies barefoot and beating on drums with big signs." But I doubt the "hippies" will retort; I doubt they will fire back with similarly derogatory, stereotypical language. Those opposed to the war here at UMass-Amherst, and across the world, do not operate under the same narrow-minded views or pointless rage. Rather we are a clear thinking, rational group of individuals who see the proposed military action against Iraq for what it really is. If Graham were interested in calmly debating the issues surrounding the war with one of us, he would find us to be much more than obliging. But no, the jingoist philosophy being pumped out by Bush and the media does not allow for this; instead they are encouraging strong and hasty action, shooting first and maybe asking questions later. Furthermore, they have also supported the type of stereotyping found in Graham's letter, assigning loose labels to abstract ideas and invisible men.

I would like to openly ask anyone in favor of this war, "Why? Why invade Iraq?" All of the reasons given by the administration are familiar to me by now, as are the repetitive attempts by the hawkish politicians and media and public to rehash them. I personally find it very embarrassing that the media, or anyone for that matter, takes them seriously. Outside of a world of make-believe and fantasy, I find it simply impossible to do so.

Is Iraq a danger to us? I don't think they are, considering that the U.S. has been bombing Iraq nearly every day since the end of the Gulf War. Considering this, we're much more of a danger to them. Then there are those sordid U.N. sanctions, which, according to the World Health Organization, have killed off an entire generation of Iraqi children. That's not to mention crippling the infrastructure of the nation, rendering the Iraqi people incapable of simply surviving, from putting food on the table, forget starting wars. Do they have weapons of mass destruction? According to Scott Ritter, the head of the last inspections team to have gone into Iraq, their weapons program had been successfully eradicated, making it impossible for them to develop them in the time since (I honestly don't believe Iraq does W.M.D., but if they did, wouldn't they be more likely to use them when provoked by a pre-emptive strike?).

We must consider though, that there is only one nation to have ever been crazed enough to use a weapon of mass destruction. Furthermore, there are many nations across the world in violation of U.N. resolutions that possess nuclear and chemical weapons – Israel is the left's favorite example. And, if people had the capacity to think back to the 80's, they might remember how the United States itself was convicted by the U.N. of supporting the terrorist contras in Nicaragua, funding the deaths of hundreds of thousands (the U.S. of course merely ignored the U.N. and went about its business as usual).

If we are to assert that Hussein is a dictator guilty of atrocities against his own people, we should remember that we were financing Hussein up until the Gulf War (much like the way we funded the Taliban). There were two AP articles recently, one this past summer regarding how the United States knowingly funded Iraq's chemical weapons program during the time in which the notorious gassing of the Kurds took place, and another a few weeks ago on how the U.S. funded Iraq's germ warfare project. This is the Associated Press, not just some 'crazy hippy'.

Is there a connection to Al-Qaeda? Does Iraq harbor terrorists? Yes, says Donald Rumsfeld. He's said this many times, in fact, always promising to provide evidence, inevitably failing every time. Oh but it seems I've forgotten, we don't need evidence in this new war – we are to simply shut up and do what we're told, to be true Patriots.

In light of all these facts, is a war against Iraq justified?

Graham doesn't even attempt to supply us with the paltry justification offered by the administration, perhaps he assumes we should have already known and accepted it by now as the absolute truth. Instead, he has gone the extra mile, identifying the 'root' cause of the conflict: Good and Evil, two equally empty words, which mean essentially nothing when applied to the complicated workings of the international world. Bush and the military fight solely for Freedom, against the Forces of Terror. What lies behind the words Evil and Terror does not matter, only that they are constantly kept at bay.

Frankly, I find the behavior of both my politicians and fellow Americans to be appalling, shameful, dangerous. We have had so many warnings, from history, and from writers like Orwell and Chomsky. I, like many others, subscribe to the view that a war with Iraq will unleash terrible chaos in the Middle East, throwing gasoline onto an already raging fire, a blaze that could potentially engulf the entire world. I assert that opposing the war with Iraq is the only sane viewpoint available at the moment, a conclusion arrived at by simple common sense and logic, a view un-obscured by anger. And trust me, I really don't care if you call me names. In a real world of rationally thinking adults, I don't think any such viewpoints should even be acknowledged, let alone taken seriously.

To the Editor:

I am writing this in response to recent editorials/views that have been expressed in your editorial section. I feel that there is a view that has not been expressed – the facts. It is easy to get caught up in the rhetoric that is thrown around by all sides. Feelings run high on both sides of the issue, but a decision that could mean life or death should not be based on "feelings".

Fact: Saddam Hussein is a dictator who uses murder as a tool to terrorize his own people. Fact: Saddam Hussein invaded the sovereign nation of Kuwait in August 1990. Fact: He was given six months to end his occupation and refused. Fact: Saddam Hussein agreed to U.N. Security Council resolutions as part of the peace treaty that ended the Gulf War in 1991.

Fact: He has ignored most if not all of these resolutions for 11 years. Including his lack of cooperation to U.N. weapons inspectors in 1998, which prompted their removal. Fact: He previously had a nuclear weapons program, and had developed large amounts of chemical and biological weapons. Fact: He had used chemical weapons against Iran and against its own Kurdish population in the 1980's. Fact: He supports the suicide murderers that kill innocent citizens of Israel, and that impede any means of true peace between Israel and the Palestinians, by offering financial benefits to the families of these terrorists.

The U.N. has tried to "peacefully" control Saddam for the past eleven years. Saddam has had four years without any weapons inspectors present. Do you really believe in your heart that someone who had a nuclear weapons program would not return to it? Do you believe that the weapons inspectors were 100 percent successful in removing all of the chemical and biological weapons that Saddam had stockpiled?

And most importantly, can you say with certainty that, (a) Saddam would not sell these chemical and biological weapons to terrorist organizations that have ill will towards the U.S. and her allies, (b) Saddam Hussein would not use nuclear, chemical, or biological weapons against Israel or any other nation allied with the U.S., and (c) He would not use these weapons against his own people?

What has Saddam Hussein done to earn the trust of the world's nations? I believe that the answer is, absolutely nothing. He has used lies, trickery and deceit as a shield.

It is my belief that he should no longer be allowed to make a mockery of the sanctions imposed upon him. He must immediately allow full inspections of all sites without any strings attached. Without this, there is no reason to believe that he does not have such weapons. With the recent defection of a high-ranking Iraqi military official, there is now even more reason to be concerned.

I believe that there is no other way to provide for the safety of our great nation, and the safety of our friends and allies than to introduce a regime change in Iraq. Saddam has had ample opportunities to comply with the U.N. resolutions and has chosen to ignore them. I have faith in our military forces and in their commander-in-chief that they will do what is necessary to protect democracy, protect the lives of our armed forces, and protect the innocent people of Iraq. May God Bless America.

"New" on the horizon

By Jennifer Eastwood
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The word "new" brings with it connotations of unimagined dreams. It's the hope for a brighter tomorrow, the excitement of something never-before-seen, and all those other sentimental terms associated with originality.

And it is always romanticized by anticipation. As such, Japanese animation fans better sit back, relax and await their preview of the new films up and coming this season.

Leading the pack is Miyazaki's Spirited Away. Hayao Miyazaki, accredited as Japan's most renowned filmmaker, originally wrote and directed the film, earning it praise as the most successful film in Japanese cinema history and winning the Golden Bear Award at the 52nd Berlin Film Festival this year.

In the good American tradition of capitalizing on success, the U.S.-based Walt Disney studio soon picked up the film's rights and set to work on its English-speaking version. But not to fear, for it was in safe hands, as John Lasseter served as the version's executive producer and Kirk Wise its director. (Those Disney-regulars out there may recognize Lasseter as Pixar's director for Toy Story – the original and the sequel – and A Bug's Life and Wise as co-director of Beauty and the Beast and The Hunchback of Notre Dame.) What's more, the critics love the new version.

Other anime films and DVDs for the fall promise not to disappoint. Sequels abound and new releases contain storylines sure to entertain even the newest of viewers.

"Fushigi Yuugi Eikoden" – Words cannot express how much I love this series. I don't even care if some folks say it's cheesy, this stuff is my cocaine and I must have more. Miaka has a baby now, but not for long. A girl named Tuka steals it and becomes the new priestess of Suzaku. Priced to sell for $30, this DVD contains a 24-page booklet and a wicked lot of extras.

Knockin' on Heaven's Door – Cowboy Bebop fans rejoice! Columbia Tri-Star has acquired the ability to release the feature length film sometime in late 2002/2003. Much like the TV show, the film is set in the solar system circa 2071, and all the show's regulars will have their usual starring roles. Also, all the original voice actors will be present for the English dub of the movie – doesn't that just make you all kinds of smiles?

"Panzer Dragoon Orta" – Sure the name sounds a tad wacky, but this game lets you ride your own dragon while fighting an empire of evil. So how bad could it be? The date of release is Nov. 1, for Sega and Xbox systems. It'd be stupid to mention how awesome the graphics are; we've come a long way since "Legend of Zelda," and to be honest with you,

THE ANIME COMPANION

The wave of Japanese animation to more over American culture in the past thirty years or so has left millions of anime fans in its wake. In the beginning, the '70s had "Speed Racer" and the '90s "Pokemon." And all along, stereotypes of anime have cropped up as well. Unfortunately, the average otaku – anime fan – has the tendency to be discriminated for their entertainment choices, regardless of the enormous variety of viewing options available.

But what do you do if you actually enjoy this form of media and want to enhance your knowledge of Japanese cultural codes and beliefs at the same time? Let The Anime Companion be your guide. In no way is this book intent on being the formal encyclopedia on all things anime. But truth be told, there are many references in the episodes, which are outside of the American experience.

For example, hanafuda is a game of gambling played with 48 cards in 12 suits. This pastime is a combination of a court game where plants and animals were matched up according to their season and the Western playing cards, which were introduced by the Dutch. The goal is to gather as many cards from the matching suits as possible. In the program Urusei Yatsura, the two characters, Ataru and Lum, stay up all night playing this game. So there, now you don't have to go around wondering

Japanese Animation and Manga Society

We've heard endlessly about the various sports and performing arts groups on this campus. And although there's absolutely nothing wrong with this info, there are other registered student organizations that exist. The focus this week is on the University of Massachusetts Japanese Animation and Manga Society: UMJAMS for short.

The group was granted their Registered Student Organization contract ratification in 1994. Since then, they've held meetings and video screenings in all genres of the medium anime. On Oct. 26, an unofficial marathon is scheduled to take place with a primarily thriller/horror theme for the Halloween season. Selected films include Perfect Blue, Vampire Hunter D, Iia-toh, Jubei-chan and Escaflowne: the movie.

"We make our selections based on popular member picks and what our target audience is going to be," said Jessiqa Greenblatt, UMJAMS librarian.

Brendon Reed, vice president of the club, explained the meetings: "For the first 30 minutes, we show off/user picks. They could be new films or old school anime. We like to broaden the horizons of our members and show them things they otherwise wouldn't have seen."

Meetings are on Tuesdays from 6-11 p.m. Plans are underway to make Morrill Auditorium 329 the permanent screening room for UMJAMS sessions. Any change in plans are posted on the website. Joining the mailing list will also keep those updated on any new plans, allowing students to question fellow members.

Membership fees are only needed for those wishing to access the club's entire anime library. There's a maximum limit of two checkouts at a time. Penalties are extended only when individuals fail to return the borrowed property, and there's no inconvenience of a five day only rental like certain other corporate video rental establishments, like cough, Blockbuster, cough, cough.

But UMJAMS does more than just view movies in dark rooms. Plans are being organized regarding overnight accommodations for an upcoming anime convention in Boston. Think of your favorite manga/anime characters coming to life in front of you. For the duration of your stay, people who share your love of this popular form of media surround you. It's kind of like a Star Trek convention...without the Klingons.

The most recent event that transpired involved a trip to see the much lauded Spirited Away. Social nights, which involved the playing of video games and cards, let the members socialize and take a break from viewing anime.

While on my interview, questions arose as to the general style used by animators when it comes to their characters. Yeah, you've probably guessed what it was, the age-old, "how-come-their-eyes-are-enormous" question. Immediately my quandary was answered and my persistent confusion was solved. According to Greenblatt and Reed, the designs were influenced by 50s cartoons like Betty Boop. Of course, Betty's voluptuous curves were meant for adults, not children, much like certain anime. Adult themes are explored in many of the films (go see Grave of the Fireflies if you don't believe me). It's always a good thing to keep in mind that just because it's animated, doesn't mean it should be displayed in front of the kiddies before bedtime. But I've digressed.

I hope this has been informative for anyone who has a passion for either manga or anime – or both! If you love the stuff or you're just curious, showing up for a movie or two is certainly worth it. Level of involvement with the group is entirely up to you. Bring a pile of your mangas or movies to share, or just sit in a corner and enjoy. Either way it's a great way to spend and evening and meet other students that are just as obsessed as you.

"[Spirited Away is] visually imaginative, thematically instructive and thoroughly delightful," wrote Ian Boyar of the Orlando Sentinel. "It takes us on a roller-coaster ride from innocence to experience without even a hint of that typical kiddie fluff sentimentality."

"[It is] an animation landmark as monumental as Disney's 1937 breakthrough Snow White and the Seven Dwarfs," said Jeffrey M. Anderson of the San Francisco Examiner with the same fervor.

The frequent question often arising in situations of a dubbed film is if it has lost anything under the Mouse's care. But most critics say no.

"This English-language version...does full honor to Miyazaki's teeming and often unsettling landscape and to the complexity of his characters," wrote David Chute of L.A. Weekly.

Many critics claim the film reminds them of Lewis Carol's adventure novel...albeit a much darker version, as Dan Fazio of Citysearch put it. "The closest American counterpart to Spirited Away is Alice in Wonderland, but no analogy will fully prepare you."

The tale surrounds a 10-year-old girl named Chihiro and her adventures through the mysterious, mythical world of the Land of Spirits. Ruled by an evil witch, this magical realm has its share of surprises and unique characters, including a transparent spirit named No-Face, whose unfulfilled desires cause danger to all nearing him. In the end, Chihiro must face through a series of challenges to save her parents from a cursed existence.

all the money some of these graphics designers get paid should result in some spankin', spiffy graphics.

Manga – I'll be perfectly honest with you, I own no mangas to speak of. As such, I do not consider myself to be a worthy distributor of information regarding its impending release, but here's a short list for those who do collect. Mars, Volume 5 appears to contain the bad boy/good girl plot that has the potential to suck a person in, providing the content itself doesn't suck. Shadow Star: Shadows of the past TP (Dark Horse Manga) also contains the teen angst thing. An alien life form, which can change its shape, accordingly changes her life forever. If you're into it, I'm sayin' go and get them while they're hot.

Misc. consumer goods – What else screams "cool $#!+" more than anime action figures? New collectables for Battle of the Planets and Hellsing are available for less than the cost of a choice pair of Abercrombie & Fitch socks. Another sick (and I choose to define the word in terms of ultimate coolness, not a physical ailment or negative connotation) item for sale is The Art of Spirited Away. Sure this movie is all over the anime scene like stink on fish, but the artwork is phenomenal and worthy of at least a second glance.

Low in high places... and Northampton

By Myles Sullivan
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

LOW
Iron Horse Music Hall
Oct. 8

NORTHAMPTON – I sat in a creaking wooden chair. It wobbled at even the slightest of movements. Each time I leaned forward to take a sip of my over priced yet delicious dark beer, I risked falling over, hitting my head against the table at which I sat, rolling onto the floor unconscious and careening down the flight of stairs that lead to the first floor of the Iron Horse Music Hall. None of that mattered though, because I was there to see Low.

If quiet is the new loud, then Low are the Gwar of slowcore, a genre known for its delicately built song structures, musical restraint and understated tension. Low is the most important watershed band of the slowcore genre, having crafted several strong albums (I Could Live in Hope, Secret Name and Curtain Hits the Cast) and the masterpiece Things We Lost in the Fire.

The strength of Low's back catalogue led critics and fans alike to entertain unrealistic expectations for their new album simply entitled Trust. On top of all the hype in accordance with a new Low album, the trio from Duluth, Minnesota is known to put on a remarkable and intimate live show.

As a fan, my expectations were through the roof and while I sat at my table drinking that beer and almost falling off my chair, I could not help but wonder if Low would live up to the hype.

After an enthusiastic and endearing performance by the bald headed Mark Eitzel, the self-proclaimed Sean Connery of the hipster music scene – a man who composes imagined theme songs for Discovery Channel animal shows while stoned – Low took the stage.

Two skinny fellows, one tall and dark and the other average height with caramel hair, moved towards their guitars and a synthesizer. A woman dressed all in black approached an arsenal of percussive instruments and other music-making tools hidden from my view by a steel girder. She brushed her curly brown hair back from her big brown eyes and looked as focused as the Karate Kid right before he snaps a bully in the face with his crane kick.

All three musicians were pensively standing, focusing on synchronizing for that first important moment. After freeing his left leg from a tangle of electrical chords, Alan Sparhawk, the caramel lead vocalist, joined his mates and kicked off the first song.

"(That's How You Sing) Amazing Grace," a mournful and unrewarding dirge from the Trust album opened the set, which was made up almost entirely of all new material – a disappointment to many fans hungering to experience old favorites from albums lovingly memorized over seasons of long winter nights.

The new songs off Trust are by no means weak, especially when compared with other recent releases, but Low's new album lacks the sincerity and sense of barely restrained passion that gave the trio's previous work its sharp tension and spiritual undercurrents. Trust suffers from the lack of climactic pay-offs and emotional resonance found on previous Low releases, leaving the listener with a frustrating semi-poignancy and an ultimately unfulfilling experience.

Two gems off of Trust are "La la la Song" and "Canada." The sheepishly delightful "La la la Song" ended with Sparhawk's simple guitar twang, as he and his drummer/wife Mimi Parker delivered innocent and painfully tender vocal harmonies. "Canada" surprised the crowd with its bombast – thundering drums and aggressively relentless bass supplied by third member Zak Sally boxed our ears and made it clear that Low still have surprises left in store for us.

After "Canada" received an extended round of applause, Mimi Parker matter-of-factly sated, "It only gets worse from there," with only the hint of a smirk curling at the edges of her lips.

As the night progressed, Low treated its audience to some old favorites such as "Dinosaur Act," an unstoppable track from Things We Lost in the Fire, and surprised us again by covering Pink Floyd and joking around with the audience during the encore. A band as somber and important as Low isn't allowed to have a sense of humor. "You shouldn't make fun of 'Free Bird' cause that's a really good song," Zak Sally said to a heckler, who apparently had just turned 21.

After a disappointing start caused by the backlash of their own previous brilliance, Low revealed themselves to be not only imperfect, but perfectly human. I walked out of the Iron Horse with a dent in my wallet from the bar and an appreciation for the Low live show – now if only I could catch them touring in promotion of an album worthy of their name, which is...Low.

Piano Man hits Broadway

Movin' Out a classic soundtrack

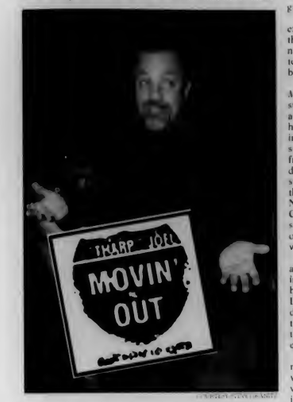
By Jake D. Lewis
COLLEGIAN STAFF

BILLY JOEL
Movin' Out
Sony

When I first heard there was going to be a Broadway musical based on the music of Billy Joel, I felt both thrilled and upset. On the one hand, the combining of two of my favorite things (musical theatre and the Piano Man) had me scouring the Internet for any buzz on the show, and if it was even possible, an MP3 of the show's early run in Chicago. Conversely, though, I was anxious too, for to successfully accomplish such a feat is by no means an easy task, and if the show bombed in any way, it would look poorly upon Joel, whom I deeply admire and respect.

While I have not yet seen the staged production of Movin' Out, I ran out to the stores on the day of the cast recording's release and grabbed the CD right away. I'm pleased to announce that the album is a sigh of relief to this humble fan, offering both the Joel music that everyone loves plus some of the fan-favorites that never made radio airwaves ("Summer, Highland Falls" for one). At the same time, the show's music arranger, Stuart Malina, has managed to keep the songs intact while at the same time making them more Broadway-ready.

For instance, the Joel-staple "We Didn't Start the Fire" is turned into a song to accompany the story's protagonists as they are fighting in Vietnam. But that's not all: Michael Cavanaugh's vocals become nearly Doors-like, sounding like the spirit of Jim Morrison, while the instrumentation clearly captures some of the drugged-out, violent nature of the times. It most closely resembles Joel's "No Man's Land" (not in the show), with its hard-rock edge uncharacteristic of the Piano Man (another tune also not in the play, thankfully), yet is a smooth fit into the context of the show.



It might disappoint some fans or theatre devotees that the show's story is told entirely through music and dance, with no stopping for dialogue. As the musical's creator, famed choreographer Twyla Tharp says, "[Billy's] language is the script." Through a whopping 27 songs, the 25-person cast weaves a Forrest Gump-type plot stretching three decades, centering on the lives of Brenda, Eddie, James, Judy and Tony (all characters from some of Joel's best songs) and their rises and falls as they grow older.

What's best, though, is that the songs all work extremely well together within the narrative structure of the storyline. There's an immediate blend from the aforementioned wartime anger of "We Didn't Start the Fire," to the low-key ballad "She's Got A Way," set in a bar in both Vietnam and back home in the States.

Michael Cavanaugh plays a narrator of sorts for Movin' Out, not really taking part in any of the action on stage, but holding an omniscient view over all as he sits at the piano and plunks out all the songs. This could perhaps be Movin' Out's only logical complaint from listening to only the CD; for while Cavanaugh is a talented singer, the CD, at times, starts to feel more like a release from a Billy Joel cover band, one guy on vocals for the duration. Granted, other cast members join him in singing back-up, and it adds some sense of reality that the characters don't suddenly break out in song, just the Narrator, but to some, it may be a draw-back. Cavanaugh has some obvious Joel mannerisms while he sings, but it is never uncomfortable to listen to him take over a song that fans have grown to love popularized with Joel's voice.

Surprisingly, Tharp and Joel incorporate a fair amount of the latter's recent classical compositions within the show, and it works better here than it did to me all by itself on the Fantasies & Delusions album last year. Due to my disadvantage of not yet seeing the staged production, I cannot say what is going on onstage during these moments, but coming out of your stereo in the context of the setting described in the liner notes, it is highly effective.

Joel once said he was done writing pop music after he released River of Dreams in 1993. Yet, in a recent interview, he said if Movin' Out goes well, he would consider writing an original score to a Broadway musical. By all indications from hearing the CD, I consider Movin' Out an enormous triumph and can only hope Joel won't pack his bags anytime soon.

MICROLOGY

Soup, my friends...soup is where it's at. In a strange but fortunate epiphany from God, it occurred to me that the hot liquid nourishment is one of our best friends on this campus, provided it's prepared the right way. Its amino acids, nutrients from vegetables and other healthy whatnots provide us with oodles of ways to eat right and keep warm.

Let us first reflect on the changes our canned soup has undergone over the past five years alone. Really, what took so long for the canning factory to realize that soups can, indeed, be fashioned with pop-top lids much like pudding or fruit? Secondly, and perhaps more importantly, content has shifted from the traditional. "Wow, this time I got two pieces of chicken in my bowl," to many soups containing a variety of meats and seasonings.

And whom do we thank for this sudden rush of deliciousness? None other than corporate businesses and the competition they're in. Think about it. What's come out of the Cola wars other than beverages with fake vanilla and lemon flavor? Wow, thanks Pepsi, my life was incomplete until citric acid was placed in my already nutritionally void fizzy boys. Consider the results of the competition in these "soup wars." We are living in an age of unlimited choices, some of the following being the result of the grueling competition over the past half a decade or so.

Campbell's – One of the first brands of soup to make it to our kitchen tables. The warm nostalgia of a can of creamy tomato soup and a grilled cheese still makes me think of "Romper Room" and fluffy, yellow comfort blankets with little puppy dogs on them. Contemporary art brought the red and white cans into the realm of the art collector, while at the same time reminding us of our collective childhoods. (That is, unless your parents were anti-soup and you spent your life munching on salad.)

Progresso – Probably the first company to try to steal the chicken-flavored limelight away from Campbell's. Their chicken noodle soup contained far larger noodles and visible chunks of carrots and celery. Still, there was never any fear that this blue-labeled beast would ever totally control all the oyster crackers, what with Andy Warhol and his famous depiction of the classically American, Campbell's.

Ramen noodles – Known to my siblings, cousins and myself as oodles of noodles, these Asian noodles have been the best friend to college students for countless decades. This is due to their inability to be ruined by even the most retched of cooks and their tendency to be incredibly inexpensive. They also provide the option for fresh vegetables and meats to be added during the cooking time and forego the usual mushy carrots, which tend to dominate the soup world. Soup for One be warned, your day in the sun was over when the Ramen was brought forth upon the world.

Campbell's Thick and Chunky – As a general rule of thumb, things that are thick and chunky at the same time make me want a doctor's note to accompany them. Other than that, this is some pretty good soup. John Goodman advertised for this meaty soup/stew in the 70s, and since then, Campbell's has had no shortage of beefy men to appear in their ads. Today's trends lean towards football players and their mothers serving them steamy bowls of sirloin burger with potatoes and a beef base thicker than the love of a linebacker for his mama.

Campbell's Selects – Chalk up another victory for the bi-colored can. These above all other soups are my personal favorite. New varieties include the old standby, chicken noodle, with variations on seasoning. Roasted garlic, rosemary and herb seasoned are a few of the added flavors. Out of all other brands of soup – including the original – these soups have an excellent broth to noodle ratio, with chowdahs maintaining the rich and creamy goodness you'd get in a down east clambake.

From ready made to just add water, from screw tops to the impenetrable can opener only variety, soup wars keep churning out new and different ways to control our taste buds and foster brand loyalty. For once it seems as though we've actually benefited from something corporate, and now that I've said that, I just know there's gonna be a Campbell's scandal involving sweatshop labor, harbor seals or global warming on the horizon, just you mark my words.

what those two were doing together all night long; I've spelled it out for you.

In alphabetical order, hundreds of what would otherwise be confusing Japanese terms are explained along with the occasional informative photograph. There are also examples of where the defined terms are found in various films such as Ranma 1/2 or Phantom Quest Corp. Subject categories range from clothing to weaponry and are clearly labeled for easy access. The terms are presented in the Hepburn style of romanization, which basically means the character-based language has been converted into a form that uses our own alphabet letters for easier pronunciation.

One of the other nice features of this informational encyclopedia is the author's expression of opinions on matters of both anime and manga. Granted he warns that the boxes will be used for venting his own personal frustrations, but the boxes are chock full of information regarding commonly held misunderstandings for those of us who aren't fully informed when it comes to all things anime.

My favorite of these explanations belongs to the question, "Why do anime characters have oddly colored hair?" Explanation: when manga –Japanese comics – are drawn, they are usually in black and white, and it would be increasingly difficult to have every character with the same hair color. Often times the hair is lightened, and if the manga is converted to anime or a color illustration, the hair color can get kind of punchy. On a final note, the author mentions that anyone with a problem regarding alternative hair colors need only journey to downtown San Francisco and see the variety of hair colors in real life. Other ranting includes destruction of the assumed meek personalities of the female characters in anime and the status of homosexuality in Japanese culture.

A section located in the back of the book gives category arrangements and an English/Japanese glossary for quick reference of the topics discussed. The more information, the better, in this case – any way to break down the 500 plus terms is all right by me. Granted, the more educated of anime fans would probably want the kanji printed with the romanized terms, but once again, this wasn't meant to be the official anime handbook. For what it is, this book does a fine job with informing and entertaining the reader at the same time.

What have I learned from this book? That I still haven't experienced even a fraction of what anime has to offer, despite the examples I've been exposed to. Also, that the culture of Japan has been overlooked by many – but not all – American audiences. This book is a well-organized guide to fans who want to absorb every possible bit of info on their hobby and a straightforward resource material for those of us who've been horribly confused by something quickly mentioned on Akira. Whatever your level of anime understanding, this book is a fast way to answer 99 percent of your Japanese animation queries.

Fine Arts Center and New WORLD Theatre all abuzz tonight, bringing dance and poetry to the Valley

The Mark Morris Dance Group performs at the Fine Arts Center Concert Hall tonight at 7:30 p.m.

Mark Morris Dance Group

The Mark Morris Dance Group leaps and spins into the University of Massachusetts Fine Arts Center Concert Hall tonight at 7:30 p.m. Mark Morris formed the Mark Morris Dance Group in 1980 and has since created over 100 works for the Dance Group.

The Dance Group travels all over the United States and even to Australia this season. Based in Brooklyn, Morris choreographs his work by beginning with a piece of music and creating movement from what he hears. This production explodes with grace, wit and brilliance of his dancers.

Known as "the Mozart of modern dance," as put by the Fine Art Center-sponsored Spotlight magazine. Through his work and his insistence on having live musicians, he has created some of the most interesting modern dancing to the most beautiful music.

Live music is rare in dance performances, so take this opportunity to experience a wonderfully choreographed performance by Mark Morris himself.

Tickets range from $7-$15 for Five College students and $10-$40 for other patrons.

Imagine the Angels of Bread

Looking for something new to do tonight? Check out the New World Theatre's Rubi Theater production of Imagine the Angels of Bread. This performance is based on a book of poems by former UMass professor of English, Martin Espada. The heart of the collection is a series of autobiographical poems recalling family, school, neighborhood and work experiences from bouncer to tenant lawyer.

The Rubi Theater's production is a stunning contemporary Hip-Hop version of Espada's poetry that delivers an impressive serving of his own life through memories of odd coincidences and unusual anecdotes. His type of poetry is only straight-to-the-point, glimpses of reality. The show will run tonight at 8 p.m. at Bowker Auditorium.

Tickets can be purchased there or at the Fine Arts Center box office for only $5 for Five College students.

Revolution's Nicol wins MLS award

FOXBORO, Mass. (AP) — Steve Nicol won the MLS Coach of the Year award Wednesday for taking over the struggling New England Revolution and leading them to the championship game.

The Revolution (8-13 in their last 12 games) play the Los Angeles Galaxy for the title Sunday in Foxboro.

Nicol was New England's assistant coach when Fernando Clavijo was fired May 23 with a 2-3-1 record. Nicol subsequently interim coach and led the Revolution to an 11-10-1 record in the regular season.

In the playoffs, the Revolution beat Chivas in the quarterfinals and Columbus in the semifinals.

Nicol served as a regular for six years and appeared sparingly in their last 10 games. He replaced Jay Heaps, who retired during the season.

Coming in third was Colorado's Fernando Clavijo, who was fired after a 4-8-3 record. Mike Lapper of Miami tied Nicol for second in the voting.

Last year's winner was Dave Sarachan, who led Chicago to the MLS championship.

NEW YORK (AP) — Jay Canizaro, who had his best season with 10 goals and 10 assists for the New York/New Jersey MetroStars, was named Comeback Player of the Year in voting by a panel of reporters in 26 league cities.

Carlos Bocanegra of the Chicago Fire was selected as the Rookie of the Year. Bocanegra, who led the team in minutes played, received 15 votes to 9 for Canizaro.

BASEBALL

ANAHEIM, Calif. (AP) — Every year the Anaheim Angels ask the question of the roster: Prior or Pettitte. Both are now gone.

Following the trade of Pettitte, Prior became the Angels' only legitimate ace and he pitched only against Bonds in the World Series. Prior will play a place in baseball for the next 25 years.

Prior, who San Francisco will face 27 times in the regular season, put Bonds off-balance with a curveball over the outside corner. Bonds is the most feared hitter in baseball, so Prior became the spotlight. Bonds is 1-for-7 against the Cubs' rookie with four strikeouts in eight at-bats.

CHICAGO (AP) — The Chicago White Sox worked a contract clause that drastically reduces Frank Thomas' salary, clearing the way for the two-time MVP to become a free agent.

The White Sox sent Thomas a letter on Oct. 5 telling him they were invoking a diminished role clause in his contract. Covered with knowledge of the agreement on condition of anonymity, that clause would reduce his base pay to $250,000 and defer most of his regular $7.8 million salary.

DETROIT (AP) — Kirk Gibson returned to the Detroit Tigers, naming manager Alan Trammell's staff as a bench coach on the team he led to a World Series title.

DENVER (AP) — The Colorado Rockies hired former major leaguers Sandy Alomar, Jamie Quirk and Dave Collins as coaches and rehired Rick Mathews as bullpen coach.

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) — The trial over Barry Bonds' record 73rd home run baseball began with two men and their respective lawyers still deadlocked over ownership of the coveted ball.

Opening statements by attorneys for Alex Popov and Patrick Hayashi are set to begin Wednesday before San Francisco Superior Court Judge Kevin McCarthy.

FOOTBALL

HOUSTON (AP) — Five-time Pro Bowl offensive tackle Tony Boselli will miss the rest of the season for the expansion Houston Texans after failing to fully recover from three shoulder surgeries in the past year.

JACKSONVILLE, Fla. (AP) — Tony Brackens decided to end the charade, calling it quits on a season in which his injured knee kept him from practicing regularly or playing up to his standards.

The Jacksonville Jaguars placed their all-time sack leader on injured reserve allowing him to have surgery on the ailing left knee that made him a shell of his former Pro Bowl self.

DENVER (AP) — Broncos strong safety Kenoy Kennedy was suspended by the NFL for one game without pay for his helmet-to-helmet hit on Miami receiver Chris Chambers.

He will miss Denver's game next Sunday at Kansas City, but will not be fined.

SANTA CLARA, Calif. (AP) — Terrell Owens won't get any trouble from coach Steve Mariucci for autographing his touchdown ball with a pen he stored in his sock before presenting it to his financial adviser in the front row Sunday.

However, Seahawks coach Mike Holmgren called Owens' celebration "shameful" and "a dishonor to anyone who ever played the game," and Seattle defensive lineman John Randle, who once celebrated a sack by crawling on the ground and lifting his leg like a dog near a fire hydrant, called it "embarrassing for the league."

MIAMI (AP) — Green Bay Packers fullback Najeh Davenport reached a plea agreement with prosecutors on charges he broke into a university dormitory and defecated in a woman's closet.

Defense attorney Richard Sharpstein said Davenport will have to do community service in the agreement reached with prosecutor Herbert Walker III.

BASKETBALL

LOS ANGELES (AP) — Los Angeles Lakers owner Jerry Buss was released from a hospital early Wednesday after he collapsed when he apparently tore a neck muscle at a fund-raising dinner.

Buss, 69, was released early Wednesday from Cedars-Sinai Medical Center and returned home, Lakers spokesman Bob Steiner said.

New England Revolution coach Steve Nicol won the MLS Coach of the Year award Wednesday, Oct. 16, 2002 for taking over the struggling New England Revolution and leading them to Sunday's championship game against the Los Angeles Galaxy.

John Black, another team spokesman, said Buss had severe pain in his neck while he was at the Carousel of Hope Ball at the Beverly Hilton hotel.

HOCKEY

ATLANTIC CITY, N.J. (AP) — A former Philadelphia Flyers defenseman testified that he was pressured to play in a 1998 playoff series while injured, aggravating a broken foot that prematurely ended his 18-year NHL career.

Dave Babych is suing Comcast-Spectacor, owner of the Flyers, and team physician Dr. Arthur Bartolozzi, claiming his injury was mistreated and he was misled about its severity in the interest of keeping him in the lineup.

TENNIS

MADRID, Spain (AP) — Qualifier Agustin Calleri stunned third-seeded Marat Safin 7-6 (6), 7-6 (3) in the inaugural Tennis Masters Madrid second round.

Eighth-seeded Carlos Moya saved a match point before beating Fernando Gonzalez, fifth-seeded Juan Carlos Ferrero outlasted Jarkko Nieminen, and No. 7 Sebastien Grosjean advanced when Xavier Malisse was forced to retire because of a wrist injury.

ZURICH, Switzerland (AP) — Fresh off a tournament title, Kim Clijsters overcame a head cold to beat Daja Bedanova 7-5, 6-2 in the Swisscom Challenge opening round.

Also, qualifier Alexandra Stevenson countered 11 double faults with 10 aces to beat Ai Sugiyama, seventh-seeded Daniela Hantuchova eliminated Janette Husarova, eighth-seeded Anastasia Myskina defeated Elsa Raymond, and Patty Schnyder beat Denisa Chladkova.

BRATISLAVA, Slovakia (AP) — Rita Grande beat Tathiana Garbin 6-2, 6-1 to advance to the VUB Open second round.

Qualifier Ashley Harkleroad beat Marlene Weingartner, and Mariana Diaz Oliva beat Mayui Serna.

AA's top five.

Shaking the doubters

When Delaware (4-3, 2-2 A-10) started the season with consecutive conference losses to Richmond (15-13) and William and Mary (45-42) many people thought K.C. Keeler's team would be lucky to finish in the top half of the A-10. But after this week's 23-10 victory over JMU and last week's 27-10 triumph over Northeastern, the Blue Hens are back on the bubble for a postseason berth.

The Hens rushed for 179 yards on 49 carries as they pounded the Dukes. Dan Long received A-10 Rookie of the Week honors as he pulled down nine passes for 99 yards and a touchdown. But the real story was the Delaware defense, as Keeler's squad allowed JMU just 34 yards on the ground and forced a pair of turnovers.

The Dukes (3-4, 2-3 A-10) have struggled since winning their first two A-10 games of the season, losing their last three against Nova, Maine, and Delaware. The Dukes did keep all three games somewhat close, however, so should they win out, they could finish in one of the top three spots in the conference. That will be difficult, though, with games remaining against UMass, William and Mary and Northeastern.

Delaware has perhaps the toughest stretch run in the conference, as they conclude with away games at UMass and Maine then finish up at home against Villanova.

Welcome to the win column

The UNH Wildcats were looking like the A-10's best shot at an 0-for in-conference this season, as they hardly competed in four losses to begin the season, three coming in the A-10. But all that changed with the foot of A-10 Special Teams Player of the Week Connor McCormick, who drilled a 27-yarder with 16 seconds to go in the game to lift the Wildcats (2-4, 1-3 A-10) to a 20-19 victory over Richmond (1-4, 1-2 A-10).

The Spiders ran for 262 yards, controlling the clock for most of the game, but it was not enough to trump Mike Granieri, who threw just 18 times, but went for 200 yards in the game, which was enough to overcome three UNH lost fumbles.

Don't get excited. Wildcat fans, these two teams will likely be duking it out with Rhode Island for last place in the conference. UNH faces five of the six best teams in the A-10 over the rest of the season, with the lone other team, Villanova, already having drubbed UNH 45-3.

Freshman running back Anthony Riley rushed for 81 yards on 16 carries in Northeastern's 38-13 win over Rhode Island Saturday. The Huskies rushed for a total of 287 yards on the afternoon.

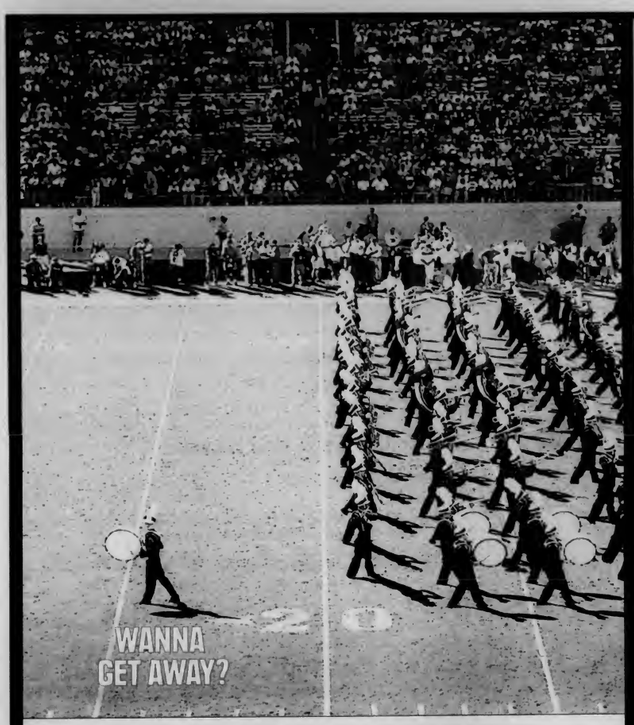
and Kevin Quinlan manned the backfield two years ago. Sophomore Jason Peebler has been used more as a receiver out of the backfield and a wideout after beginning the season as the starter at tailback.

"We'll flank him out some and keep him in the backfield [at times]," Whipple said. "If [Rosario or Cobbs] got hurt, we'd go right back to him. But those two guys have proven that they can be good [tailbacks].

"Those two guys are better running backs and Jason is the better football player because he can do so many things."

The defense has been impressive, thwarting two of the better running attacks in the conference in Richmond and Maine. The pass defense has also been stellar, holding Jake Eaton - one of the most efficient throwers in the A-10 – to just 12-of-35 on Saturday.

"We've seen that we have the players that can make the system go," Whipple said. "We're young and we're getting more confident."



The center of the defense has been linebacker Jeremy Cain. With starter L.A. Love out for the season after a preseason injury, the pressure was on Cain to carry the linebacking corps. With seven tackles and a blocked field goal against the Black Bears last weekend, Cain earned the Atlantic 10 Defensive Player of the Week award.

"He's been our best player," Whipple said. "One reason is because of T. Brower. Because people are paying so much attention to him, Cain is getting singled up and they're not even blocking him sometimes. Those backs are in there looking at Brower. He's proven that he can play at a really high level."

But perhaps the most interesting sidenote to Saturday's game will be the QB matchup. With Gordon putting up the best numbers in the conference and UMass junior Jeff Krohn being one of the most feared weapons in the conference, the defensive backfields for both teams should have their hands full. Whipple called the two the best in the A-10 at throwing the football. "For Krohn and Gordon, third-and-12 is not like it is for other people in the league."

Wildcats on the prowl

No. 4 Villanova comes to UMass as the class of the Atlantic 10

By Matt Brady

Last week's victory over No. 2 Maine was possibly the Massachusetts football team's biggest victory since a 1989 playoff win over Furman. The 20-10 victory put the Minutemen (4-2, 2-1 A-10) in a position to move into the Division I-AA Top 25 and the opportunity to come away with the Atlantic 10 regular season title.

All the Maroon and White need to do now is upend the fourth-ranked Villanova Wildcats (6-1, 4-1 A-10) when they visit McGuirk Alumni Stadium this Saturday. If history holds true, it will be a tough time for the Wildcats as the road team in the Nova-UMass series has won just three times in the last 19 meetings between the two squads.

"They've won on the road on real grass fields," UMass Head Coach Mark Whipple said. "They won at Colgate and they won at Rutgers. So they've proven that they can win on the road. I think a lot of it has to do with their defense. They're not giving up very many yards, they're not giving up big plays. They tackle well and they are fast."

Villanova features one of the most potent offense-defense combinations in all of Div. I-AA. Quarterback Brett Gordon leads the charge having completed two thirds of his passes and having put up 16 touchdowns to just six interceptions.

Whipple called Gordon the best quarterback other than N.C. State's Heisman Trophy candidate Philip Rivers that the Minutemen would face this year.

"Rivers is a pro. Gordon plays like a pro, but just doesn't have the physical stature," Whipple said. "North Carolina State had pro players and Villanova has I-A players. So from an I-A player He passed that against Rutgers.

"He's just so accurate and knows the offense," Whipple continued. "He's a good player."

The Wildcats have shown little sign of missing a beat after losing one of I-AA's top running backs and current Philadelphia Eagle Brian Westbrook, as Terry Butler has carried the backfield load for the most part this season. Also picking up the slack has been the wide receiver corps, which features one of the best one-two combinations in the conference in Shaz Brown and Brian White.

"I think they are just as good (as last year) on offense," Whipple said. "They don't have that intangible of Westbrook that can go everywhere. But I think they have made up for that with their defense."

The Wildcat defense has been giving up just 231 yards and slightly more than 11 points per game this season, and according to Whipple is one of the best units that Nova has fielded in years. Brian Hulea and Jamison Young lead the squad, as they have combined for 96 tackles, six and a half sacks and two interceptions on the season.

Also intriguing is defensive lineman Terence Taylor, who has only 17 tackles on the season, but four and a half sacks and six pass breakups. At 6-foot-4, 250 pounds, the Hartford, Conn. native will give the Minuteman offensive line a handful.

"He's the best that I've seen them have," Whipple said. "I don't think there's any question. The numbers don't lie."

As for the Minutemen, two of the biggest question marks at the beginning of the year – the running game and the defense – have been exceptional the last two weeks. The tandem of red-shirt freshmen R.J. Cobbs and Raunny Rosario gives the Minutemen the best two-some since Marcel Shipp and Jerry Azumah in 1998.

Brady puts NU on his shoulders

By Matt Brady
Collegian Staff

After suffering its first loss of the season to Delaware two weeks ago, things looked dismal for Northeastern, as it found itself in a 10-7 hole to conference whipping boy Rhode Island.

Then Shawn Brady decided it was time to win.

The sophomore threw a career-high five touchdowns on 17-for-23 passing to lead the Huskies (5-1, 3-1 Atlantic 10) to victory, running away with a 38-13 win at Parsons Field. He tacked on 41 yards on the ground and was rewarded for his performance by garnering A-10 Offensive Player of the Week honors.

The backfield duo of Anthony Riley and William Griffin combined for 181 yards and the vaunted Husky defense held Rhody to an anemic 137 total yards, with just 83 coming on the ground. Turnovers nearly cost the Huskies in the early going, as they lost three fumbles in the game. NU has a non-conference contest with fellow Beantown opponent Harvard before it returns to the Atlantic 10 slate with a trip to face conference powerhouse William and Mary in two weeks.

It was yet another setback for URI (2-4, 0-3 A-10), which remains the only team without a win in the conference. Jayson Davis continued his struggles as he only managed to complete just five of his 13 pass attempts for 54 yards. The Rams are home the next three weeks against Delaware, Richmond and James Madison.

McGuirk Monsoon

Massachusetts' 20-10 victory over Maine was one of the school's biggest triumphs since the Minutemen (4-2, 2-1 A-10) won the 1998 National Championship. R.J. Cobbs' 112 yards on 18 carries – including a 49-yard scamper on third and long in the first quarter – led the Minutemen to paydirt, as the defense clamped down to allow less than 100 total yards in the second half.

The loss was the Black Bears' first this season as Maine (6-1, 4-1 A-10) struggled to move the ball in the muddy mess that was McGuirk Alumni Stadium. The Bears were obviously missing wide receiver duo Paris Minor and Stephan Gomes, who have not played since being suspended from school two weeks ago for violating Maine's code of conduct.

The Black Bears head to Florida International for a non-conference matchup this weekend before getting back to the A-10 in two weeks when they host Hofstra. The Minutemen face Villanova this weekend in UMass' second consecutive game against a team ranked in Div. I-AA.

No luck for field hockey

By Todd Foster

The final score and stat-sheets are deceiving in many games.

In the Massachusetts field hockey team's contest against the New Hampshire Wildcats last night, the Minutewomen dominated every aspect of the game, but couldn't get "the breaks." Lucky breaks can sometimes determine the victor from the loser. In this game, Head Coach Patty Shea and her team were on the unlucky end of the spectrum.

"I think the breaks are huge, but I think you create your own luck sometimes," Shea said. "Hard work does that, and we'll start to come around. If we keep working hard, some shots might deflect off [the other team's] sticks and go in."

UNH	2

While splashing through the soaked turf, the Minutewomen (10-14, 0-1 Atlantic 10) totally controlled New Hampshire under the lights of Richard F. Garber Field. After its best performance of the year, the Maroon and White were still unable to pull off its first win, falling to UNH, 2-1.

"This was without a doubt our best game," Shea said. "They put together two great halves of hockey and controlled 70 percent of the possession. We out-shot them and out-cornered them, but now we need a little bit of the luck. They did a great job, and really stepped up. It was a great game to watch."

The Wildcats got the first opportunity to score with an early corner. At the 2:30 mark, the Wildcats blasted a bullet at cageminder Christine Tocco. Tocco made a spectacular save on the shot, but couldn't collect the rebound as Jenny Stamp tapped in the easy board for the early lead. Maurice Boyer was rewarded an assist on the goal.

After four near misses, Ashley Gilbert showed off her incredible power as she wound up and fired a rocket on goal that bounced right over UNH goalie Christine Buckley to tie the game, 1-1. Gilbert's goal was her first goal of the season.

Through most of the first half, the Maroon and White controlled the ball and kept it in the UNH zone. Stellar passing, well-developed attacks and patience seem to shift the momentum to UMass.

The Wildcats made the most of the few opportunities they saw in the game. Off a corner, Kristen Weldon fired a hard shot at the right corner as Tocco made the move for the save. As the shot approached the corner, Katie White made a beautiful deflection to sneak the shot by the UMass cageminder. The goal gave New Hampshire the lead going into halftime, 2-1.

In the second half, the Minutewomen controlled the majority of the possession, but couldn't find the back of the cage. Despite a hard fought game and a dominant performance by UMass, UNH slipped by the Minutewomen with the 2-1 win.

Shea saw a lot of improvement in this team compared to the squad she saw at the beginning of the season. By keeping the game simple, UMass looked like a totally different team.

"The simpler you can keep it, the easier the game flows," Shea said. "You are always second guessing in this game, you are trouble. Just take what the defense gives you."

Beth Percival and the Massachusetts field hockey team dropped to 0-14 (0-1 A-10) on the season with a 2-1 loss to New Hampshire Wednesday night.

Could the 'Rally Monkey' be the new Mr. October?

By Jim Litke
Associated Press

A monkey is in the running to become baseball's next Mr. October.

Which means the mouse can't be far behind.

People who said Walt Disney Co.'s ownership of the Anaheim Angels would have an effect on the game, take a bow.

This is what happens when the Yankees have to sit the occasional World Series out. The National League sends the San Francisco Giants and Barry Bonds, a superstar with more candlepower than Derek Jeter and Roger Clemens combined. Meanwhile, the most recognizable mug on the AL pennant-winners belongs to a grinning simian.

And the strange part? If the rally monkey has as big an impact on the final round of the postseason as he did on the first two, teammates might vote him a boatload of bananas as a series share.

"The monkey has been great for us," said David Eckstein, the 5-foot-8 shortstop who's been responsible for a few Angels rallies himself.

"We wait until he comes out, I guess."

Who knew?

For most of the 40 or so years of their existence, the Angels were called cursed, haunted, star-crossed and worse. Turns out they were just biding their time, waiting for the right cue.

Two years ago, two kids on the video crew at Edison Field were bored, so they slapped a clip from the movie, "Ace Ventura: Pet Detective" on the stadium JumboTron. While the furry little fellow jumped up and down on all fours exhorting the team, the kids superimposed the words "rally monkey." The Angels came back to win. A new tradition was born.

The monkey's facetime increased as the ballclub got off to the worst start in franchise history. What was different about this edition, though, was how calmly it responded.

Manager Mike Scioscia, familiar to Los Angeles fans because he once wore Dodger blue, could have panicked. Instead, he spread the burden around. Instead of letting his ballplayers blame one another, he taught them to pick each other up.

He coaxed production from warhorse Tim Salmon, the longest-suffering Angel, and fire from rookie Francisco Rodriguez, who's become the understudy for closer Troy Percival. The veterans in between, guys like Darin Erstad and Garret Anderson, responded to Scioscia's levelheaded approach by playing with more joy or confidence than the Angels' gloomy tradition should have allowed. Contributions came from unlikely places at critical junctures. The rally monkey just turned out to be the last piece of the puzzle.

"My mouth is hurting because I've been smiling so much," Salmon said. "You know what? It's just joy. I'm so excited."

The high point?

That's easy: Monday night, about an hour after Adam Kennedy hit his third home run of the game to finish off Minnesota in the AL championship series and write the perfect end to a new chapter. Kennedy is a ninth-place hitter with all of 24 career homers. Up until he left the on-deck circle for that fateful at-bat, he was sure Scioscia would send up a pinch-hitter.

But like the rally monkey, he sparked a post-season-record-tying 10-run outburst in the seventh inning and sent the Angels to their first World Series in four decades of trying.

And the lows?

There are almost too many to know where to begin.

Maybe the best place to start is the absolute bottom, the night reliever Donnie Moore killed himself, three years after surrendering the deciding run in Game 5 of the 1986 ALCS.

Moore called himself "horsehelper" after the loss, the Angels lost the next two games and the series to Boston. In the summer of 1989, tired of drink and depression, Moore committed suicide.

Things didn't seem much better the night Gene Autry died. The "Singing Cowboy" bought the Angels as an expansion franchise in 1960 and for four decades, he dreamed of seeing his Angels in the World Series, just once. He died in 1998, at age 91, his heart still aching.

Maybe that's why his widow, Jackie, got to present the ALCS trophy to Scioscia, and why the manager told her, "We've had a lot of Angels looking down on us. This one was for Mr. Autry."

As recently as spring training, just-departed slugger Mo Vaughn said he was glad to get away from everything the Angels represented. After signing with the Mets, he said, "They ain't got no flags hanging at friggin' Edison Field."

Turns out he might have spoken too soon.

N. Korea admits to weapons

Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld, left, and Air Force General Richard Myers, Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, conduct a media briefing Thursday, Oct. 17, 2002, at the Pentagon, in Washington. Rumsfeld said that he believes the North Koreans not only have a weapons program but also already have produced some weapons.

By George Gedda
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) – The United States and South Korea, stung by North Korea's admission that it has a secret nuclear weapons program, are calling on Pyongyang to reverse course and abide by promises to renounce development of these armaments.

The startling disclosure, announced Wednesday night by the White House, changed the political landscape in East Asia, setting back hopes that North Korea was on the road to becoming a more benign presence in the region.

Japan expressed "grave concern" about North Korea's nuclear revelation.

The disclosure adds to the administration's list of foreign policy headaches, coming on top of a possible U.S. attack on Iraq and the overall U.S. war on terrorism.

A senior U.S. official, speaking on condition of anonymity, said North Korea acknowledged having "more powerful" weapons. U.S. officials have interpreted that statement as an acknowledgment that North Korea has other weapons of mass destruction. However, the same officials say they are unsure whether North Korea actually does possess biological or chemical weapons.

On Aug. 29, U.S. Undersecretary of State John Bolton said: "In regard to chemical weapons, there is little doubt that North Korea has an active program."

Any administration inclination to try to confront North Korea, which President Bush has labeled as part of an "axis of evil" with Iraq and Iran, could be tempered by a desire not to become overextended internationally.

Presidential spokesman Sean McCormack said North Korea was guilty of a serious infringement of a 1994 agreement with the United States under which Pyongyang promised to be nuclear-free in return for economic assistance.

"The United States and our allies call on North Korea to comply with its commitments under the nonproliferation treaty and to eliminate its nuclear weapons program in a verifiable manner," McCormack said.

U.S. officials, who spoke on the condition of anonymity, said North Korea told U.S. diplomats that it was no longer bound by the anti-nuclear agreement.

In Seoul, South Korean Deputy Foreign Minister Lee Tae-sik, said South Korea has consistently pursued the de-nuclearization of the Korean peninsula in line with international agreements. Japan and South Korea are treaty allies of the United States.

"We urge North Korea to abide by its obligations," he said.

State Department spokesman Richard Boucher said late Wednesday the United States had been ready to offer North Korea economic and other benefits if Pyongyang agreed to curb missile programs, end threats and change its behavior in other ways.

"In light of our concerns about the North's nuclear weapons program, however, we are unable to pursue this approach," Boucher said.

For a time, North Korea had seemed ready to shed Bush's "axis of evil" designation. Pyongyang was carrying out capitalist reforms and reaching out to both Japan and South Korea. It also resumed talks with the United States earlier this month.

It is not clear what steps the Bush administration may have in mind now for North Korea.

Also unclear is just how far along the North Korean nuclear program is.

Both U.S. and South Korean officials, however, have said that North Korea also maintains vigorous programs to build large stockpiles of chemical and biological weapons. Last November, South Korea's defense minister said that North Korea kept between 2,500 tons and 5,000 tons of biochemical weapons in six different facilities and had the capability to wage germ warfare.

As McCormack made the announcement, Undersecretary of State John Bolton was flying to East Asia to consult with allies on the changed situation.

William Triplett, a defense writer and East Asia expert, said the North Korean admission means Pyongyang now has or will soon have the ability

Chem professor speaks at UMass

By Jen Hodson
Collegian Correspondent

Chemistry Professor Bassam Shakhashiri of the University of Wisconsin-Madison, addressed the University of Massachusetts last night.

Shakhashiri's lab bench was decorated with colored balloons, multicolored graduated cylinders of purple, yellow, pink and blue, and other chemicals designed to create his experiment.

"Our guest lecturer describes himself as a scientist by training, a teacher and public servant by trade, advocate by conviction, optimist by nature," William E. Mahoney, a major donor to UMass and the sponsor of the annual seminar presentation, said.

"He finds outlets in all four, but he might add a fifth: entertainer by application."

He went on to discuss Shakhashiri's accomplishments, the awards he's received, and the passion that Shakhashiri has in teaching to all audiences about science and chemistry.

"I'm very grateful to the University of Massachusetts-Amherst for inviting me to be the Mahoney Lecturer, it's an honor for me to be so recognized and as a token of my appreciation I'd like Mr. Mahoney to have this small button that says, 'Science is fun,'" Shakhashiri said.

Before he began his experiments, he talked about how important science is and gave different analogies of how to make people understand and become more interested in the field of science.

"We live now in a very advanced scientific and technological society," Shakhashiri said. "And the gap between those of us in science and the rest of society is widening at a very alarming rate."

He went on to explain that there are two sectors in science: the science rich sector and the science poor sector. The science rich sector, he explained, consists of colleges and universities, parts of industry, and the national lab while everyone else relies on the science poor sector.

"It is incumbent upon those of us in the science rich sector to help close this gap by communicating science not only to each other but especially to the public authorities," he said.

He continued on about the idea of making a distinction between scientific literacy and science literacy.

"The way in which we approach problems, the way in which we formulate questions, the way in which we deal with issues that comes before us, that makes us scientifically literate."

The Uplifters are genuinely passionate about their work

By Scott Enright
Collegian Staff

With eyes closed and hands raised above the table in front of him, Jan Christiansen, conga player in the Uplifters band, rocked back and forth in his chair as Jimi Hendrix wailed a soulful tune on the radio.

Uplifter's bassist, Jon Siegel, and lead vocalist/guitarist, David Linhart, sat across from him at the table, deeply engaged in a conversation concerning the lyrics off their latest CD, Burning Bush.

"Some of the lyrics we write might hit someone like a dagger," Siegel said prior to this moment of band intimacy.

He had been clarifying his point of view on a previous conversation about why the Uplifters did not want to push their message onto anyone.

"Right now music is being aggressively pushed," Christiansen said. "The same five songs on the radio are repeatedly played.

"As a listener the musicians that you get hipped to, the ones you have a personal attachment to, are musicians that give you a sense that you found them," Christiansen added. "You came upon the musician, the musician didn't come upon you."

Burning Bush is a 13-track CD filled to the brim with original concepts written by the band members.

A momentous stream of rhythmic and melodic beauty carries these poetic ideas of the world throughout the disk.

The words are deeply rooted in world and social issues. They carry an encouraging tone that works as an incentive to think about surrounding issues.

"What could be a more important occupation than raising up the next generation?/ Instead of subsidizing corporate mergers them should be subsidizing all our mothers," the group sings on "Hierarchy."

These words are sung in a fashion that is very common to reggae music. A syncopated rhythm encases the words and creates a dance for the tongue.

Although they have been influenced by reggae, the band members express that their music is a collection of what they have been exposed to in American culture.

They often surprise people who go to their shows expecting to hear exclusively roots reggae sounds like those of Bob Marley or classic reggae sounds such as those of Dennis Brown.

"One time we played and people were expecting roots reggae," said Christiansen. "Unlike a lot of American reggae bands, we are not trying to be Jamaican reggae. We are trying to be true to ourselves and to our experiences.

"People are attracted to people being real," he said. "Real recognizes real. When we bring hints of Zeppelin or The Police or other music that people are familiar with, people feel at ease."

The band formed at Cornell University where all five current mem

Mount Holyoke College begins "Take the Lead" initiative

By Regan McKendry

Mount Holyoke College's "Take the Lead" program began officially in South Hadley.

Fourteen girls from across the nation will be heading to western Massachusetts this weekend for a conference to showcase their ideas on how to improve society.

"Take the Lead is all about help[ing] young women develop confidence and the ability to make a difference in the world," said Patricia VandenBerg, Executive Director of Communications and Strategic Initiatives for Mount Holyoke.

The program is designed to bring together 30 of America's high school juniors for the annual teen leadership conference. Various educational and community leaders are expected approximately 700 candidates based on their potential for leadership and making a difference and then review personal insights and experiences. They were also involved in a survey area, such as academic, environmental and community involvement.

Each student tries to improve her leadership skills through workshops, guest speakers, and mentoring. In addition, each participant develops a social action plan of their personal choice. Some ideas of the students include organizing a job fair for the homeless in Boston, helping Mexican migrant families, and using taped-recorded stories to connect mothers in prison with their young children.

The workshops, which are offered to all students, will work on team building and public speaking. There are also optional workshops in the areas of community organizing, conflict resolution, fundraising/budgeting, raising publicity and time management. Each student will have the opportunity to focus on an issue that they care about to develop an action plan. Three completed action plans will be awarded $500 prizes from the college.

Each participant will also be matched with a specially trained Mount Holyoke student to work together with the teens to offer advice, help develop the action project, and provide continual feedback for up to six months. The Mount Holyoke students have all been trained by the college's Weissman Center for Leadership.

The guest speakers for this year are Alexandra Gromko Simisola Sanni, and Patricia VandenBerg. Gromko, a Mount Holyoke alumna from 1991, is an Emmy award-winning news anchor for ABC affiliate WTVQ in Lexington, Ky. Sanni, from the college's class of 1997, created and headed a new Junior Achievement program in Nigeria, a program made possible by a multi-year grant from Proctor and Gamble. VandenBerg is known across the country for her knowledge of communications and leading change.

"My mentor really helped me to think about ways to execute my action project," former participant Lindsay Mecca said. "It was inspiring to work with someone who shares the desire to achieve goals that sometimes seem unattainable."

Take the Lead concludes this Sunday, Oct. 20.

Author William Moran addresses the Odyssey Book Shop in Hadley

By Bridget Henry
COLLEGIAN STAFF

SOUTH HADLEY – Author William Moran gave a lecture on his newly published book Wednesday night at the Odyssey Book Shop in South Hadley.

Moran's book is titled The Belles of New England: The Women of the Textile Mills and the Families Whose Wealth They Wove.

Moran was formerly a writer, editor, and producer at CBS News. He has worked on "CBS Evening News" with Walter Cronkite and "CBS News Sunday Morning" with Charles Kuralt. Prior to his CBS career, he was a writer for the Associated Press.

Over the past five years, Moran has been visiting mills and gathering information about the New England textile industry.

"I wrote this book because I was curious about what happened to the women who worked in the textile mills," Moran began. He then proceeded to give an overview of the research he compiled for the book.

According to Moran, the first textile mills were constructed in Great Britain during the early 19th century. The British were very protective of their invention and did not wish for models of the machines to be distributed, for fear of competition by other countries. American Francis Cabot Lowell toured the English mills on a visit to Great Britain. Though the English were careful not to let him see any blueprints, Lowell had a photographic memory. Once back home in America, he was able to reconstruct the machines he had seen in England. Moran then talked about the first mill in America, which was built in 1814 in Waltham, Mass. Lowell saw the mistreatment of workers in Great Britain and did not want to commit any human rights atrocities within his own mill. He employed poor farm women who were generally unskilled and had little exposure to culture.

Lowell wanted to make sure that the women only worked for three years and then moved on with the money they had saved for their families. He did not intend for it to be the women's main source of income. He provided them with comfortable housing, and even coordinated events where they listened to classical music or were read to by educated men like Thoreau and Emerson.

When Lowell died at 42, his associates let the conditions of the mill deteriorate. They constructed mill towns all over New England, and slums quickly formed around them. Moran explained that owners gave the workers lower wages and increased hours, and allowed child labor. The machines were dangerous and the overworked women often lost limbs or were scalped. In protest to the unfair conditions, women staged walkouts, which were informal strikes. According to Moran, this is where the seeds of the American labor movement were planted.

When the walkouts failed to improve conditions, the women left. At the same time, famine in Ireland led to increased immigration to the United States. Moran said the farming women were largely replaced by a workforce of Irish immigrants. Once they realized there were better jobs available, they too left the mills, leaving mill owners with another worker shortage.

The French Canadians were the last group of people to immigrate to the United States and work in the mills. Much of Moran's lecture focused on the troubles faced by this group of women, who were still overworked and underpaid. He talked about a strike that was formed in response to a pay cut in 1912. The strike was a success and the mill workers won a 15 percent pay increase. According to Moran, this was one of the first successful strikes in America, and helped set an example for future labor unions.

At the end of his lecture, he briefly answered questions from the audience. He stated that the most surprising thing he learned when writing the book was about the connection of the northern mills to southern slavery. The mills were heavily reliant on the cotton grown in the South. Because of this, tensions between northern mill owners and abolitionists were extremely high during the antebellum period.

Moran also talked more about the problems faced by the French Canadian women working in the mills and spoke about blacklisting.

According to Moran, when a woman was fired from one mill because she disagreed with the work conditions, she was put on a black list that effectively prevented her from being hired at any mill. When asked why he focused on the women of the mills more than the men, Moran revealed that at first he did not intend for the female mill workers to be the center of his book.

"They were such a big part of the New England mills that I decided to focus on them," Moran said.

Witness lies about sniper

AP/WIDE WORLD

Montgomery County Police Chief Charles Moose announces witness was lying about sniper. Police are still looking for the suspect of the 11 shootings that have taken place since Oct. 2.

By Stephen Manning
ASSOCIATED PRESS

ROCKVILLE, Md. (AP) – A witness who claims he saw a sniper fire with an assault rifle and flee in a cream-colored van gave a phony story, investigators said Thursday in a setback that casts doubt on much of what the public thought it knew about the roving killer.

Prosecutors are investigating the witness, whose name wasn't released, to determine whether he should be charged with filing a false statement.

Fairfax County Police Lt. Amy Lubas said the inaccurate account was exposed by checking it against that of other witnesses to Monday night's killing of an FBI cyberterrorism analyst in a crowded Virginia parking lot outside a Home Depot. It was the only shooting so far that people actually saw.

Asked if the witness may have intentionally misled investigators, Montgomery County Police Chief Charles Moose, who is heading the investigation, said simply, "Yes."

Investigators had showed a certain optimism after the latest attack seemed to yield the best details yet about the killer. But that gave way to anger Thursday.

Moose said there was no credence to the witness' description of the cream-colored van with a burned-out rear taillight. And while Moose did not give the witness' exact description of the shooter, he chastised reporters for running reports that variously described the gunman as dark-skinned, olive-skinned, Middle Eastern or Hispanic.

"When we have people from the media interviewing witnesses and publishing reports, we get confusion," Moose said. "We get this noise ... out there that gives people tunnel vision and makes them focus in on things that are not appropriate. ... We would like to be able to do our job."

Similar accounts of a sniper in a cream-colored van were published Tuesday in both The Washington Post and The New York Times, based on an interview with an Arlington, Va., man who said he met the witness at the Falls Church, Va., Home Depot.

Glen Guymon said he and the witness started talking when police ordered them inside after the shooting. The witness said he saw a man in the parking lot standing behind a cream-colored Chevy Astro van. Guymon told the newspapers.

"There was a woman walking out to her car, he said she was with a guy," Guymon told the Times. "The guy behind the van lifted up a rifle and shot her, then got in the car and drove off. He was probably about 50 feet away from where he shot her."

Reached at home Thursday, Guymon told The Associated Press: "I wish my name had never been anywhere. And I don't want my name used in connection with this story ever again."

Moose said the witness' description to police of the shooter's AK-74 assault rifle is also bogus. But investigators cautioned that they still believe the sniper is using one of a family of more than 30 similar assault-type weapons capable of firing a .223-caliber bullet.

"The message we're trying to say is please keep an open mind," Moose said. "People saw a description of a weapon over the last day and a half and we're convinced they eliminated people they know because they say, 'Their gun is not the weapon I saw in the paper.'"

Moose said the disclosure of the fake story, coming a day after investigators said they were unable to draw a composite sketch, was hardly a setback. He said investigators were still chasing leads and he stood by previous composite drawings of vehicles witnesses reported seeing leaving the attacks: a white box truck and a Chevrolet Astro van or Ford Econoline van.

Since Oct. 2, there have been 11 shootings in Maryland, Virginia and Washington, D.C., that have left nine people dead and two wounded. One of the wounded, a 13-year-old boy shot outside his school in Bowie, Md., was upgraded Thursday from critical to serious condition. The other wounded person, a woman in Virginia, was released from a hospital last week.

The victims were men and women of varying ages and ethnic backgrounds, each hit with a single bullet while going about everyday activities. A tarot death card left at one scene was inscribed: "Dear Policeman, I am God."

Law enforcement sources said the investigation by federal, state and local authorities has led to information about a number of people with high-powered guns, both legally and illegal ly owned.

A firearms safety instructor said the FBI has been asking registered owners of .223-caliber guns to bring them in for ballistic fingerprinting.

"They're looking for suspects," said Mike Hefferman, owner of Self Defense Technologies in Kensington. "They're looking at people who have a background in firearms, possess .223 weapons, and have the capability of using them."

to export nuclear warheads along with the long-range missiles it is already exporting to the Middle East and South Asia.

The new development is certain to have an impact in Japan, which may now feel vulnerable to potential nuclear blackmail by North Korea. There may also be increased challenges in Japan to the country's post-war commitment to pacifism.

Groundbreaking for the new reactors, which were supposed to have been completed by 2003, just took place in August, with a State Department official on hand.

The two countries had just resumed high-level security talks less than two weeks ago for the first time since October 2000. It was during those discussions that North Korea informed the United States of its nuclear activities.

The United States has been suspicious about North Korea's nuclear intentions for some time despite the 1994 agreement. A CIA report in January said that during the second half of last year, North Korea "continued its attempts to procure technology worldwide that could have applications in its nuclear program."

"We assess that North Korea has produced enough plutonium for at least one, and possibly two, nuclear weapons."

That has been a U.S. concern dating from before the 1994 agreement. International inspections were supposed to clear up that mystery but the North never permitted them despite a commitment to do so.

The North Korean revelations apparently refer to more recent nuclear development activities, possibly encompassing the period when former Secretary of State Madeleine Albright visited Pyongyang in October 2000. President Clinton thought seriously about making a visit as well before leaving office.

Assistant Secretary of State James Kelly visited North Korea on Oct. 3-5 and demanded that the communist state address global concerns about its nuclear and other weapons programs, prompting the disclosure. After Kelly's departure the Koreans called the U.S. diplomat "high-handed and arrogant."

The Oneida Solidarity Group will hold a meeting today at 4 p.m. in the Cape Cod Lounge of the Student Union to help organize people interested in participating in a non-violent direct action aimed at bringing awareness to problems facing people of the Oneida Indian Territory.

"We have an opportunity to affect positive change for the traditional people living on their ancestral land," Dan Gulko, an organizer for the group, said. "For nine years, the people of the territory have suffered oppression at the hands of Ray Halbritter. Together, we can non-violently help bring an end to this."

Halbritter is recognized by the Bureau of Indian Affairs as the leader of the Oneida nation.

The Oneida Indian Territory is located in central New York between Utica and Syracuse. The solidarity group, along with Oneida people, plan to form a human blanket by lying down and linking arms, interfering with Halbritter's Nation Police patrol.

According to Gulko, Oneida people will demand that there be a federal investigation and trial into the crimes committed by Halbritter against the Oneida people.

"This is an action with a tangible conclusion, one that can be brought about non-violently," Gulko said.

For additional information about the meeting, contact dgulko@hotmail.com.

Tambor, a cultural fusion, takes place tomorrow in the Student Union Ballroom at 7 p.m.

A collaborative effort on the part of seven University of Massachusetts student organizations, Tambor means 'drum' in Spanish and is the title of the semi-formal event.

"It will represent how African roots influence Latin culture," said Marjorie Valdivia, vice president of Boricuas Unidos and organizing member of the group.

The event will feature a live band and two dance troupes, Uniqa II and Bomba.

The cultural night will also present guest speaker Austin Laos from the UMass sociology department.

The event runs until 1 a.m. and will be followed by an after-party until 4 a.m. at the Malcolm X Cultural Center. Admission is free. Catered soul and Spanish food will be available for five dollars a plate.

The Black Student Union, Boricuas Unidos, Black Mass Communication Project, Ahora, Gamma Phi Sigma, Groove Phi Groove and Sigma Lambda Upsilon will sponsor the event.

"The first Tambor was held a few years ago and we hope to make it an annual event," Valadivia said.

Shakhashiri said. "Science literacy refers to the public appreciation of science without really having a deep understanding of chemistry or physics or biology or any of the other sciences. We need to work hard to get more people to consider careers in science."

His first experiment consisted of him explaining the difference between chemistry and physics. He dropped a match onto a table and let it bounce a few times before it came to a rest and said, "That's physics."

Next he took the same match, struck it and said, "That's chemistry; chemistry is more striking than physics!"

His next experiment included lighting a fake dollar bill on fire which vanished after being lit. He explained that the dollar bill was made of flash paper, which means that no ash is left behind, otherwise known as an example of a control combustion reaction.

He asked for a volunteer from the crowd to give him another dollar bill. When one man did, he soaked it in a colorless liquid that had different chemicals and water mixed in. When he attempted to light it after the bill would not remain lit.

Next, he used four balloons to explain the difference between helium and hydrogen and their reactions to fire. With two balloons full of helium and two of hydrogen, he put heat to the helium balloon and it automatically popped, whereas when he put fire on the hydrogen balloon there was a sonic boom, or explosion sound, throughout the room. Then, he turned out the lights to portray a better visual of the explosion.

Shakhashiri showed the audience how dry ice, a form of solid carbon dioxide, can change from being a solid to a gas without melting in a process called sublimation. He used lab gloves to pick up pieces of dry ice that were negative 78 degrees Celsius, and dropped them into four, large, multi-colored graduated cylinders. The cylinders began to change color and bubbles formed from the carbon dioxide. Next, fog started to pour out of the cylinders.

After several other experiments, Shakhashiri encouraged people to become involved with science and hoped his demonstrations helped do that.

"Remember no matter what you do, science is fun."

UMass hosting open house for incoming Fall 2003 freshmen

By Jamie Loo
COLLEGIAN STAFF

A campus-wide open house will be held this weekend on Saturday, Oct. 19. The New Students Program is predicting at least 4,000 high school students from Massachusetts and at least 25 other states will attend the "Autumn Event."

Prospective students will have a chance to speak with faculty and current students, take tours of the campus, attend panel discussions demonstrations and other special activities. They will also have the chance to visit labs, classrooms and studios. Visitors will also have the opportunity to visit the W.E.B. DuBois library, University Health Services, the art galleries and the Durfee Conservatory.

Jeanne Horrigan, Director of the New Students Program, said this is the largest recruitment program offered on campus. Horrigan estimates that about 500 faculty, staff, and students from all over campus will be helping out with the day's activities on Saturday.

The program will begin with registration at 9 a.m. at the Mullins Center and at 10 a.m., Chancellor John V. Lombardi and President William M. Bulger will speak. At 11:15 there will be smaller information sessions given by the various academic departments on campus, where academic advisors will be on hand to answer questions. There will also be a registered student organizations fair in the Student Union Ballroom, where student groups will provide information on their clubs.

WMUA 91.1 FM, the UMass student radio station and UVC-TV 19, the student television station will also be opening their doors for tours as well as the student craft center, student art gallery and People's Market. Student groups, such as the Doo-Wop Shop, the dance team and the Samba dance troupe will also provide musical and theatrical entertainment on the Student Union lawn. The dining halls will be open and "grab-and-go" lunches will be served by the Campus Pond. There will also be a tree-climbing demonstration, an Army ROTC climbing wall and tours of the biology teaching lab. Between 12:30 and 2:30 p.m., there will be backstage tours of the Fine Arts Center and concert hall.

Ed Kammerer, a student who works in admissions said that past Autumn Events have been very successful in drawing recruiting students to UMass. Kammerer said he's very optimistic that the event will go smoothly and attract prospective students to campus.

"I think it's going to go really well, we put a lot of work into this," Kammerer said.

North Korean weapons: Another Iraq?

In the midst of all the commotion going on over the serial killings in the Washington, D.C. metropolitan area as well as the brewing war against Saddam Hussein, a story broke Wednesday evening adding another element to the ever increasingly trick web that is international politics. What had been to known to insiders for approximately two weeks was revealed to the public. North Korea openly admitted to having developed a nuclear weapons program.

In addition to the surprise of such an announcement was the outright defiance of North Korea in the face of a treaty the country signed in 1994. Under that agreement, North Korea stated it would renounce nuclear weapons. In exchange for this, the United States would provide economic support as well two light-water nuclear reactors to replace the older plutonium producing reactors that were already in existence.

Allies for the United States in this treaty included North Korean neighbors Japan and South Korea. Eight years later, North Korea had given all indications of being in compliance. The country's capital, Pyongyang, had begun to incorporate more capitalistic measures into its way of life, a significant step in a communist country. North Korea had also re-established communications with Japan, South Korea and the United States.

The proclamation of a nuclear weapons program is obviously in direct violation of the compromise reached eight years prior. As the United Nations has not conducted weapons inspections since, it is anyone's guess as to what the exact capabilities of this country in East Asia are. The Vienna-based International Atomic Energy Agency had been calling for inspections, but the North Korean government continually resisted.

People can complain all they want about the fact that North Korea is in violation of earlier agreements, but the fact remains that the technology, at an unknown level, exists for the creation of nuclear weapons either now or in the near future. This is an issue that must be taken seriously, and not just by nearby Japan and South Korea, but also by the United States.

With the ongoing war against terrorism and the pressing issues in dealing with Iraq, another international issue was the last thing that our government needed to deal with. Yet the problem is there, and thus it must be dealt with.

President Bush and the rest of the government must be extremely cautious to not overextend themselves internationally. With so much focus on Saddam Hussein, one cannot expect to be able to maintain the same intensity when facing off against North Korea at the same time. It can't be understated as well that while Hussein is suspected of having the necessary means to develop nuclear weapons, North Korea has already admitted to having such a program in place, immediately adding further weight to this issue.

Perhaps even more important for the United States is to remember that while all the issues currently transpiring in the international realm are vital, so are problems at home. The state of the economy and other domestic agenda has its place as well.

North Korea having a nuclear weapons program is a concern. Now it's our government's responsibility to make sure that concern doesn't turn into a problem.

Investing our efforts in divestment

YOUSEF MUNAYYER

Last week when I was in Washington, D.C. meeting with other columnists from across the country who write on American foreign policy, I had the chance to have some great discussions with them on issues not everyone cares to discuss. We spoke a lot about what was going on in our respective campuses. I found a lot in common with many of them and also the sentiments at their universities were very similar to ours.

One thing was different though. I found from all of the columnists that I spoke with, that I was the only one from a school that has not already began a divestment campaign. They were very surprised that a school the size of UMass had not yet followed the lead of other universities who have began such campaigns.

I realize many of you may not be aware of divestment, what it is, or why it is important. A divestment campaign is purely an appeal from the students of a university to its administrators to divest what money they have invested in a country that is using this money to hurt others. The divestment campaigns across the nation today target Israel. It is important to understand what has been going on in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict to understand why divestment can play a crucial role.

These are facts: the forces that Israel has, both militarily and economically, are much greater than anything the Palestinians have, and the Israelis use this power to dominate, occupy and strangle what is left of the Palestinians. No one can argue against this because these are facts Israelis will accept and some are proud to accept, sadly.

The situation in the occupied territories is utterly pitiful. People are having their homes demolished, their children shot, their fathers abducted. Running water is a scarcity as is electricity. In fact to apply the term "third world" to some parts of the territories would be generous.

The Palestinian people, however, are surviving. They are a generation of people who have been born knowing nothing but survival or death, fight or perish. But how much longer can they fight this fight on their own? How much longer can we stay quiet as the life is strangled out of them?

As a Palestinian I hope this day never comes, but the looks on the faces of fatherless children beg to differ with my wishes. This is why divestment is crucial.

At almost every event I go to to hear speakers address audiences about the Israeli-Palestinian conflict there is always one student who gets up at the end during the question and answer period asks what they as students can do to help the situation. Divestment is what you can do!

If there is anything students can do it's this. It requires you to only express your feelings for justice. Students have to get together and very simply state that they do not want the University investing in a nation that is the most condemned nation by the United Nations and continues to brutally oppress a people and even seriously considers ethnic cleansing.

When pressure was building to end the apartheid regime in South Africa not to many years ago, divestment campaigns on campuses across the country made very clear statements. The students didn't want to stand for that racist state and did not want their universities doing so either. The apartheid is over now; well at least in South Africa.

You do not have to advocate divestment because you are pro-Palestinian or because you criticize Israel's policy. The most important reason to work for divestment is that we should not be fueling either side of this conflict. We should be neutral and evenhanded.

> "You could, a) get the heck out of the Palestinian's land; or b) give them the same weapons you are killing them with..."

I feel it is important to understand the consequences of a divestment campaign. The best possible result could be that our University heeds the call of its students and divests whatever it has invested in Israel or corporations that invest in Israel. But even if that doesn't happen, and they decide investing in a brutally repressive nation is more important than say, even using that money for our education (gasp!), we will still have created dialogue and debate. We will be heard. People will want to know what is going on, and more people will learn that divestment is becoming a very popular movement and it's time to get on board. If students helped to bring down apartheid in South Africa then maybe they can help to show people that the Palestinian people have suffered enough.

I have heard people say that the Palestinians fight back with suicide bombers and that they do not deserve our help if this is the route they choose. To those people I say that the Palestinians respond in the ways that they do out of utter desperation. They would not strap bombs to their bodies if they had tanks. Ending suicide bombings is not a difficult thing to figure out, there are even two ways to do it. You could, a) get the heck out of the Palestinian's land; or b) give them the same weapons you are killing them with and they could use those weapons instead.

This conflict is bloody, and I know many people have wondered what they could do. Divestment needs to come to UMass to answer that call.

Sniper equals psycho

The massive manhunt for the Beltway Sniper has been one of the biggest stories dominating the news in the last two weeks. Whoever is perpetrating these horrific crimes has paralyzed the Washington, D.C. area with fear by shooting innocent and unsuspecting people. There have been 11 people shot, nine of which were killed. One bullet is fired at least 100 yards away from the victim out of a high-powered rifle.

The idea that the sniper is a terrorist is not being ruled out. It would be unwise to eliminate any possibilities under these terrible circumstances. Regardless of whether the attacks are the work of terrorists, every person in the community is a victim. Reports have described the man as dark skinned, possibly Hispanic or Middle Eastern. One man said that he got a good look at the guy who is a possible suspect and that he appeared to be Middle Eastern. Sketches are finally being made of the suspect. Besides the fact that he drives a white van, not too much is known about him.

The sniper is escaping before the dragnet arrives. He may even have a hideout where he is able to watch the aftermath and the chaos that goes on. Soon enough a military surveillance aircraft will be out in the hunt. It will be able to track people from far away and it will have sensors that can detect gunfire.

The tension in the area is rising. People are staying in and ordering take out, and if they do go out to dinner, they request to not sit by the window. It must be horrifying to be living your life thinking the next step you take outside of your house could be your last. There appears to be no discrimination at the people who are being shot at in suburban areas. There is no saying what the sniper will do, where he will be next, or who he will shoot at.

So, do we think this is a terrorist, who is shooting at these innocent people? Could this be a Middle Easterner on a shooting spree doing this for his country and his God?

Or is it someone from our own country, who has some major psychological problems? If we look at the situation we see that the shootings are taking place outside of the country's capital.

Maybe it is someone committing hate crimes against the government. Since the sniper is disappearing after the shots are being fired, he is trying to prove a point, by making the government look impotent. For all we know it could be some guy with a sick mind who just gets a rise out of knowing he is responsible for these deaths. He is most likely watching the media's reactions to his evil deeds. He must be proud of himself for instilling all this fear into the people of the area and causing the military to send up the surveillance aircraft. A tarot card inscribed, "Dear policeman, I am God" was the only piece of evidence found. If he really thinks he is God, then he is mistaken.

One thing that bothers me is how someone could be so sick and so psychotic. What is his explanation for his doings, to just kill innocent civilians for sport? No matter what his explanation is, whether this is a tactic used against the government or not, there is still no acceptable explanation for shooting people. Killing innocent people is so cruel.

Does he not have a soul, does he not realize the pain he is causing their families and friends? How mentally disturbed does someone actually have to be before they turn into a serial killer?

I heard on the news, "We can't let this person decide how we are going to live our lives." Unfortunately, once you are frightened by the reality of the situation, it is not so easy to go about your daily routine anymore.

People become so aware of their surroundings, they are on the lookout at all times. It is wise to be alert in times of danger and the people of the area should be, without a doubt, overly cautious. They will not feel safe until this whole thing is over.

The truth is the people of this area will not be safe until this madman is caught.

Letters to the Editor:

To the Editor:

I'm writing this article in response to Eduardo Bustamante's article, "Stopping the ride of racism." Mr. Bustamante states that the rather dogmatic nature of his previous article, "If it wasn't broke, you shouldn't have taken a hammer to it," caused many to ignore the content. While I was certainly offended that he tried to call his readers racists for disagreeing with him, it was typical of the ALANA committee's modern day witch hunt we're having on campus.

Labeling anyone with a different approach to solving the same problem a racist is the same logic that McCarthy used in the '50s. But I digress.

The point is that I have seriously considered the ALANA cuts and how best to support minorities, and I can't help but come to a different conclusion. I support the cuts and reorganization for three fundamental reasons.

One: Superfluous student support (excluding security, etc.) is secondary to education in a budget crisis. Culturally conscious groups are great to have, but they should be student-run volunteer RSOs like any other special interest groups.

Two: Separate academic facilities, even though they may be well-meaning, are inherently racist. Not only do I think it is ridiculous to say that class advising can be categorized into 'white issues' and 'black issues,' but didn't we prove that separate and equal was wrong over a half-century ago? The concept of separate advising irks me as much as separate drinking fountains for the same reason.

Three: Neither skin pigmentation nor racism is the cause for the lower graduation rate of minority students; therefore increased funding for minorities is unproductive. While it would be naïve and optimistic to think that racism doesn't exist at some level, I have a very hard time believing that at such a diverse, liberal and educated environment, that it is a strong enough force to prevent minorities from academic success.

Therefore the root cause of the problem must be an outside social factor. Any guesses anyone? I have a theory. It's money. Think about it. What is the most difficult aspect about staying in college? I think that the most difficult situation would be trying to go through this school and having to worry about whether you and your family could pay for it or not, regardless of religious or ethnic background.

So what does that have to do with race? Well statistically, minorities' incomes are slightly lower than that of Caucasians. It results in poorer secondary education and difficulty obtaining quality higher education. It is a sad lingering effect of racist policies of pre-civil rights, but the fundamental cause is no longer racism. Rather it is the simple fact that overall, the rich tend to stay rich and the poor tend to stay poor.

So if that truly is the root cause, what approach should this university take? Well I think that the best solution would be to have all advising handled by the same diversity trained staff. Minority recruitment (although necessary years ago to integrate schools quickly) is now racist and antiquated, and should be abolished. Yet this school is land grant and has an obligation to make higher education more accessible.

Therefore it should strongly consider family income and education of parents as major disadvantages. I think a blue-collar quota would be far more appropriate and productive than a minority quota.

Other than that, the University should continue what it already does a fantastic job at: Promoting cultural events and diverse classes and encouraging diverse RSOs. I've been involved in them and it's been a great experience. The University should also stand strong against hate crimes and graffiti and offer any counseling or help to anyone who has been victimized, and I think they've done an excellent job at it as well.

In conclusion, I applaud the ALANA committee and the politically active for their ideals and the work they put into events. For I, and I certainly hope the rest of campus, have the same goal. But in this case I can't help but feel that their effort is slightly misguided. It would be far more productive to take the next step in closing the race gap than to fight a battle that was won before our generation was born.

To the Editor:

I am writing in response to the Lindsey Elder's Oct. 15 column.

In this article she discusses the events that have occurred in Virginia, and believes that they prove that Massachusetts should have the death penalty. Granted the events in Virginia are horrendous, but how can you justify killing someone because they killed someone? To quote the old saying, "two wrongs do not make a right." Killing someone because they killed someone makes you just as wrong.

She goes on to say, "I always put myself in the place of the victim..." but she herself has never been faced with the horror of having someone in her family killed, and then having to decide what she feels should happen to the person, or animal as she calls them.

In December of 1995 my grandparents were both killed, shot to death by a young man for no reason whatsoever. The man was caught and it then became my parents' job to decide what should be done. They had the option to go to court and speak on his behalf and they did. They believed that causing that boy's family the same pain he caused ours was wrong. They believed that killing him would do nothing more than cause greater unneeded pain and it would.

If you follow the Bible passage, "let he among us without sin be the first to condemn," you learn that we have no right to play God and take others people's lives unless you are perfect. When we do this, we are becoming just as evil as the people who commit the crimes.

Her article also states sarcastically that she can see the letters to the Editor about the wrongly accused minorities being killed. But it is not only minorities; people in general are wrongly accused daily, and then sentenced to death for crimes they did not commit.

In Texas, one such instance was documented. A man was sentenced to death by lethal injection for killing a child. After he was executed, they found that he was innocent. What is supposed to happen then? You cannot bring this man back to life, and how do you explain what happened to his family? How do you justify killing someone that has done nothing? Our system of government is fallible and always will be.

However, sentencing someone to jail for the rest of his or her life offers a more realistic view. It costs less, and in this case, someone wrongly accused can be freed with a life ahead of him or her. Elder also states that criminals of this magnitude should be taken out of society. Forgive me if I am wrong, but when you are in jail, you are not a member of society any longer. That is your punishment: being locked in a jail cell knowing that you will never again see the light of day – this is true justice. I agree that these criminals should be faced with the harshest sentence, but killing someone is never right. It is not right when they do it, and therefore cannot be right when we do it. The events occurring in Virginia are tragic, but if we follow "an eye for an eye" we would be blind, because not one of us is perfect. Not one of us is God.

Sleater-Kinney matures from its riot grrl era

Opening act Yeah Yeah Yeahs not too bad

By Amanda Hartlage
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

SLEATER-KINNEY
The Roxy
Oct. 14

BOSTON – Fans packed into the sold-out Roxy nightclub for a performance by three bands on Oct. 14 starting out with the opener The Quails. Hailing from San Francisco, The Quails sound like a rip-off of Le Tigre and look like a rip-off of The Hives. They seemed to be outdated in their post-riot grrl fashions, with songs attempting to be political and gender aware, but instead their music comes off as "been there, done that."

The act that stood out most to me was The Yeah Yeah Yeahs. With lead singer Karen O's sultry voice and enigmatic stage presence I was sold. The Yeah Yeah Yeahs are part of the new scene from New York that is helping to alleviate the pain of pop music. Their sound is the perfect mix of dreamy vocals, rock 'n' roll and noise. Currently, their repertoire consists of six songs, but they are in the studio recording more and debuted some new songs at the show. To my surprise, The Yeah Yeah Yeahs, like The White Stripes, only have a guitar player and a drummer, but unlike The White Stripes they rock a lot harder with unadulterated rock 'n' roll.

If you love avant-garde New York rock 'n' noise, The Yeah Yeah Yeahs are certainly an entertaining band to see live. A highlight of the set was the dedication song to Karen O's cousin Jean, "Our Time," a song with lots of aggressive screaming and catchy riffs; it makes you feel the passion that is live music. Their next song "Miles Away" was reminiscent of The Velvet Underground in the way of making noise music. Overall, The Yeah Yeah Yeahs were a great addition to the lineup; in fact they were much needed and really set the energy for Sleater-Kinney.

Sleater-Kinney, one of the pioneers of the mid-'90s riot grrl movement, is from Olympia, Wash. and has been making amazing music since 1994. The members rapidly developed a strong local following through unrestrained live shows and explosive recordings. Sleater-Kinney was labeled as a feminist band, but paid no attention to frustrating pigeonholing and created astounding noise pop. Without Corin Tucker's wailing lead vocals the band would have lost its intense, edgy sound.

They played a lot of new material, which was somewhat disappointing but expected considering their 1997 album Dig Me Out remains one of rock's greatest albums. Their new album One Beat progresses their political attitudes. The opening song "02" is an example of this. "I wanna get away, I wanna run away," wails Tucker as she speaks out of the current situation of America. They also played a few songs from All Hands on the Bad One, their fifth album, a pivotal album towards their more activist views.

The crowd seemed to enjoy their more recent work, although it was quite evident there was a dedicated following. Ages in the audience ranged from 20-somethings to middle aged folks, showing Sleater-Kinney's versatility.

They ended the show with "You're no Rock 'n' Roll Fun" and then after a brief exit from the stage and applause they returned, for what I thought was the most energetic part of the evening. The encore included an old favorite "I wanna be your joey Ramone" during which Tucker proclaimed, "I'm the queen of rock 'n' roll!"

Impressive performances were also given by Carrie Weinstein, the other lead vocalist and guitarist, as well as drummer Janet Weiss who pounded out a heart-felt drum solo before the band broke into another Dig Me Out favorite, "Words and guitar."

The night ended with the crowd pleasing "Dig Me Out" which reminded everyone of where this group has been, and with their new material making a statement as to where they are headed.

After the music had ended and security became pushy, a special moment was had when all the acts came out to the merchandise table to mingle with fans. This was very comforting and reminded me of what it means to be in it for the music, unlike popular bands of the MTV-generation. Sleater-Kinney's performance proved that they have grown and matured from the riot grrl era and are now embarking on a more introspective musical journey. In comparison The Yeah Yeah Yeahs are quickly proving to audiences that they could possibly be the pop replacements we are all desperately seeking.

Sleater-Kinney headlined a sold-out show on Oct. 14 at the Roxy, but it was the Yeah Yeah Yeah's who stole the show.

Phil Anselmo has been one busy man over the past couple of years. Immense tours with Pantera, getting his indie label Hosecore off the ground, recording a new album with his second band Down, and his latest project with Superjoint Ritual must have kept him quite busy. Again, Anselmo teams up with Jimmy Bower (Eyehategod, Down) to lay down southern discomfort like nobody's business.

Now, if you're a Pantera fan expecting a carbon copy of Diamond Darryl's technical wankery, and the over-produced schlock they've been calling metal for the past few years, you may find yourself disappointed, but I'd hope you find yourself awakened. You should've learned your lesson from the first Down CD six or seven years ago. Though I'm sure there's a new generation of Hessians now getting the wrong idea. Let's set it straight.

This is raw, in-your-face and totally antisocial music for people who don't like to leave home, except to buy drugs, or for the occasional killing spree. Musically, this album is a lot more accessible than anything Eyehategod has done. I mean, the songs don't sound like the band was so high they could only let the guitars feed back for 45 minutes, and mix that down post-production to add in drum tracks and call it a song. Now, I love that band more than much else in the world, but I know that my tastes are "esoteric" at best. That, and I doubt Phil is a full-blown heroine addict.

There are 18 songs on this disc, including the two "limited edition" bonus demo tracks. The songs are fast, heavy and rocking that Louisiana swamp mosh that Bower plays like it's the only riff he knows. Added to the riff I pointed out earlier, he knows twas the swamp mosh and feedback. This CD is seriously lacking in the feedback department. Written from 1989 to 1997, it looks like these songs were the groundwork for Down's debut album Nola, but either didn't make the cut, or were just too mean. Aside from the lead track, "Oblivious Maximus," which sounds like Pantera, none of the songs suck. "4 Songs" tears apart at the seems with unbridled rage, and some of Anselmo's best lyrics since Pantera's Vulgar Display Of Power, in 1992. "All Of Our Lives Will Get Tried" painfully plods through swamp and sludge. Phil bleating out the title as a chorus, and as a mantra, making you, the listener, damn well believe it.

The songs on Use Once And Destroy show what underground metal should be: violent, evil, drug-laden mayhem that leaves the listener dead in a stupor, or bruised and battered from losing the battle of the living room mosh-pit (beware the coffee table-couch tag team!). Superjoint Ritual takes the best of extreme music, from Melvins to Meshuggah, from Pantera to Eyehategod to D.R.I. or even Carcass, and makes it a sound unto their own.

Did I mention that Hank Williams III is the touring bassist? That factoid alone makes this album worth whatever cash gets thrown down for it.

bers of the Uplifters studied. The sixth member, keyboardist Brian Knox attended Ithaca College and has since left the band.

Nick Mendoza, the band's kit drummer, had been in a reggae ska band with Siegel and Linhart for six years. The trio invited tenor saxophonist James Curwood, Christiansen and Knox to join in the founding of the Uplifters.

They have been heavily infiltrating western Mass. since their move from New York to Holyoke.

The Uplifters pride themselves in their commitment to their audience. Through their website, http://www.theuplifters.com, they are able to maintain a close personal connection with their fans and can encourage feedback.

"The day after or evening after [a show], we get an e-mail and we respond," Siegel said.

Linhart quickly jumped in and with wide eyes, described one fan that was particularly moved by the band's openness for communication.

At a show in Virginia, Candace (the fan) was reminded of her father because of the Uplifters performance. He had been a musician.

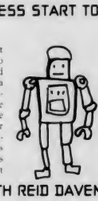
Candace was able to communicate her experience to the band. She told them that they had caused her to feel a release that she had only been able to express when she heard her father play.

Her contact with the band inspired her to drive seven hours to Connecticut so she could share an Uplifters show with her friend.

"I want to play Madison Square Garden," said Linhart. "But that's not a sign of making it. Candace is a sign of making it.

"We are learning how to connect with people," he said. "I can ride that out as long as that will last. I'm much more interested in that than in album sales."

Linhart wants the Uplifters' music to be more than entertainment. He wants it to help people understand themselves.



"You need to sort through yourself and find what you like, to have that connection to music so that music becomes useful in your life," he said.

The Uplifters will be playing Saturday, Oct. 18 at 10 p.m. at the Harp, 163 Sunderland Rd. in North Amherst.

Tickets will be sold at the door for $3.

Notes on video game related violence and the 'Arc the Lad'

PRESS START TO PLAY

WITH REID DAVENPORT

Welcome to yet another addition of the latest news in the video gaming world. Of the two subjects I must throw up there, the first is one I'm sure most gamers are rather aggravated with – that being the linking of the recent sniper suspect to video games.

As any normal gamer knows, the more realistic a game is, the more likely they are to purchase it. We have all had our fair share of chucking our books and reports aside for a few rounds of our favorite online first-person shooter. Using all weapons and all imaginable ways of mutilating digital human foes is just a way of relieving stress without actually killing anyone. Of course there are those who take the realism too far.

In the case of the recent sniper killings, video games are being blamed for giving the suspect a way to practice his marksmanship. Not since the Columbine shootings have video games been under this type of critical bashing. The one game that is taking most of the blame is the arcade game, "Silent Scope." It's a game that enables the player to fire at humans using a very realistic sniper scope. The news is pressing hard on the idea that the suspect had to have played this game, and others with similar sniper rifle systems, to have the accuracy to kill all of his targets with only one bullet per target.

The only clue left by the sniper is also being linked to the probability that the suspect is a gamer. The suspect left a tarot card stating, "Dear Policeman: I am God!" The link being that in most of the first-person shooters we play on our PCs have a code for "God-Mode" in which the character is invincible.

"You go to video game chat rooms and you have the proclamation 'I am God' all over the place," speculated Florida lawyer Jack Thompson on NBC's Oct. 11 "Today" show. "The mayhem that we're seeing, we're seeing played out by somebody who is a marksman, either in the military or a video game setting."

This problem of "insane" gamers taking the games to a very realistic level is a serious problem for the gaming industry. The industry becomes pressured into toning down games due to some psychopath wielding a gun because he was tired of pumping quarters into the arcade game. We've all received the talk from our parents of how video games rot our brains. Call me a turncoat, but I think they may have been right.

On a much lighter note, a few weeks ago I received a video game collection by Working Designs called, "Arc the Lad Collection," a game that has been available overseas for years. Working Designs is famously known for the games "Lunar: The Silver Star Story" and "Lunar 2: Eternal Blue." This new collection of four games on six disks consists of more than 100 hours of game play.

"Arc the Lad" had a tentative U.S release date in the early '90s when the Playstation system came out. However, due to a few legal complications, Working Designs was unable to release it. While the years passed, "Arc the Lad" became possibly one of the biggest role-playing games over in Japan.

It was not until recently that Working Designs was able to bring over "Arc the Lad III," but instead of simply forcing American gamers to jump right into the third installment of the saga, they released a box set of the four games: "Arc the Lad, Arc the Lad Tournament, Arc II, Arc III, and the Making of Arc." Not only that but it comes with a hardcover game guide, a memory card case, analog stick covers, and cardboard stand ups of every character from the series.

The game itself plays similar to "Final Fantasy: Tactics" in which you have to get within range of a foe before you can attack or aid allies. It takes a little getting used to, but it's a quick learning system. The graphics seem like nothing great at first, but as you continue on to Arc II and III the graphics improve, along with the game play. The first game plays very fast for a RPG, but it's crucial to understanding the story. An additional feature is that you can combine a save from a finished installment and unlock secrets in the next one.

Overall, every game will keep the regular role-player glued to their controllers for hours. I personally have spent at least a total of 48 hours on the first two games. I highly recommend purchasing this collection as it is well worth the $70 price tag. If you purchase it and get stuck, Working Designs has also released the walk-through strategy guide for those of you who can't hack it. Just kidding.

Horoscopes

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) – You'll find yourself embracing things that you had shied away from in days or weeks past. Your attitude is undergoing a change for the better. Once you get yourself laid this weekend, you'll be all set.
SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) – A phone call, letter, telegram or other form of long-distance message is essential to your peace of mind today. Be prepared to receive it. Your grandma's birthday card to you will hold $50.
SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) – Introspection will lead you directly to the door of a new and illuminating truth today. Yes, you were in fact adopted.
CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) – They say love is a two-way street, but today you may have to hog the road in order to make any headway. The Collegian offers one solution: the frats.
AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) – You can improve your own outlook, and your productivity, simply by accepting current limitations and beginning to work with them willingly.
PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) – You may find yourself entangled in a bittersweet triangle of sorts. Others involved are likely to depend upon you for a solution. But you don't have one. So tell them to ask Jeeves.
ARIES (March 21-April 19) – You must resist the temptation to capitalize on another's misfortune today, despite your need to increase the pace of your progress. Yeah, so you're selfish, who isn't?
TAURUS (April 20-May 20) – You'll want to do things in your own way today – to the extent that others may back away and leave you very much alone for a time. Kind of how the Goonies left Chunk alone with Sloth. It all works out in the end. Just make sure you have plenty of Rocky Roooaaaaaad!
GEMINI (May 21-June 20) – It's up to you to keep deception out of the picture today. During evening hours, a misunderstanding may bring tensions to the boiling point. Add ice.
CANCER (June 21-July 22) – You may be asked some difficult questions to which there are no hard-and-fast answers. Today, instinct and training work closely together. If you get stuck, just ask Abby.
LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) – You may have to pick up the pace, especially toward mid-day, in order to tend to all the personal business on the docket at this time.
VIRGO (Aug.23-Sept.22) – Don't eat yellow snow. And beware high shelves. However, today will be a great day for you. Perfect even.

A-10 soccer studs to battle at Rudd

By Andrew Merritt
COLLEGIAN STAFF

If you ask Massachusetts men's soccer Head Coach Sam Koch which game is the most important one of the season, he'll probably tell you that the next one is.

This time, however, it's not just coachspeak.

"The Duquesne game is the biggest game we've had so far," Koch said. "It's the most important game that we play as far as where we are and where they are, and looking at the A-10 schedule. They have not lost, we have not lost, someone's going to come up with a loss in this game."

The Minutemen will take on the Duquesne Dukes today at 3:30 p.m. at Rudd Field. The Dukes head into the matchup boasting an 8-1-3 record, 3-0-1 in the Atlantic 10. Meanwhile, UMass currently sits at 8-4 overall, and 4-4-0 in conference play.

Duquesne, coming off of a one-goal shutout of Temple last Sunday, is tied with Richmond for second place in the A-10, and recently jumped from seventh to fourth in the National Soccer Coaches Association of America mid-Atlantic region poll. That places them just ahead of Rutgers (fifth), who the Maroon and White defeated in an exhibition contest in August.

The speedy Duquesne squad is led by junior forward Damien Pottinger, who has scored seven goals in 12 games. He's also added two assists to make his point total 16, good for ninth in the conference, just behind UMass senior Yuri Morales. Pottinger is backed up by sophomore midfielder Derek Mackenzie, who has three goals and five assists on the season.

"We're two different types of teams," Koch said. "They're very direct, very physical, they look for knockdowns – they play like UNH played. They have great team speed, they're very dangerous that way. They're a very solid team, and very hard to play against."

The Minutemen dropped a tough 1-0 decision to New Hampshire one month ago on a late goal. Until the ball crossed the line, the Minutemen had put out their best defensive effort of the season up to that game.

The Minutemen will continue their homestand on Sunday, when they take on St. Bonaventure at 1 p.m.

Last season, the Minutemen beat the Bonnies 3-2 on a second half goal from senior Jeff Doreen. SBU finished the Atlantic 10 season in the cellar last year, with a meager 2-9-0 conference record. This season, the Bonnies have already matched their overall win total from last year (5-9-1), but have managed just one A-10 victory, a 3-1 triumph over George Washington.

St. Bonaventure will be at Rhode Island Friday which, depending on the outcome of the UMass/Duquesne battle, could have a huge impact on the Atlantic 10 standings. The Bonnies are currently on a three game losing streak, and will be looking to snap it this weekend.

After opening their season with impressive wins over Bowling Green and Oneonta State, the Bonnies earned the No. 12 spot in the NSCAA National Top 25 Poll. Since then, however, SBU has struggled, but its offense, led by senior John Phoumanmy and junior midfielder Geron Duporte, who has scored three goals on 25 shots since returning to the team after missing all of last year due to academic ineligibility.

"They were ranked 12th in the country in the beginning of the season," Koch said. "They're capable of beating anybody."

The Minutemen, who are coming off of a grueling road trip to Philadelphia and New York City, will be glad to see the friendly confines of Rudd Field again. While UMass won at La Salle (1-0) and Fordham (3-0) on the road last weekend, the length of the trip was a burden on the young team.

"It's always good to play at home," Koch said. "Going to Philadelphia in vans is never fun. It's definitely nice to be home."

The Minutemen may also have a special treat for the home fans this weekend: a chance at rewriting the history books.

Doreen, who currently leads the A-10 in shots (48), goals (12), and points (26), is inching ever closer to taking over the UMass career scoring lead from Mike Butler. Butler, who last played in 1997, put up 96 points over a stellar career, with 36 goals and 24 assists.

Doreen now has 89 points on 38 goals and 13 helpers. His goal total is good for second all-time at UMass, just two behind Randy Jacobs.

And for a player who has two multi-goal games this year, including a four-goal effort against Dayton on Oct. 5, the seven point margin between Doreen and Butler is certainly within reach with two games on the slate this weekend.

Of course, should Doreen reach the pinnacle this weekend, the crowd may go wild, but Koch assures that it will be business as usual for his crew.

"[The record's] not important until the end of the season," Koch said. "What's important is that he plays well, helps us win the game, and we'll worry about where he is in the record books at the end of the season.

"I think he's done a good job, I think he's certainly aware of it, we're all aware of it. But we're not focusing on it," Koch continued, with a smile, "and he'll probably get there faster that way."

Searching for confidence

In need of first win UMass faces RPI

By Andy Vogt
COLLEGIAN STAFF

It's only the second game of the season, but for the Massachusetts hockey team, a victory this weekend is a necessary commodity.

"We need a win, just for our confidence," defenseman Nick Kuiper said about Sunday's contest. "We'll come out and guys will be flying, we'll be working a lot harder."

The Minutemen look to collect their first "W" of the young campaign against Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute on Sunday at 5 p.m. But despite playing a squad from a non-power conference, the Mullins Center faithful shouldn't expect the Engineers to timidly show up with pocket protectors and slide rules in hand.

"They beat Wisconsin Friday night, so they're a real good team," said Head Coach Don Cahoon about RPI's recent 5-1 victory over the Badgers in Madison, Wisc.

"They're a top four team in the ECAC. We're going to have to do a real good job on special teams, they always have a couple kids that can really skate and handle the puck," he continued.

UMass will be attempting to heal its battle scars remaining from the 6-0 pasting it received this past Sunday at the hands of Boston College. The Minutemen controlled the majority of play in the first period, but the Eagles received two goals from freshman Patrick Eaves in the frame to begin the offensive onslaught.

Cahoon placed much of the culpability on his own team for the loss, saying, "a lot of it was self-inflicted from that standpoint." Penalties proved to be the ultimate downfall for the Minutemen, as nine minor infractions resulted in three Eagle lamp-lighters on the man advantage.

"We gave up a lot of bad penalties," Kuiper said, adding that the team had been working especially hard on special teams this week in preparation for Sunday. The offensive woes that UMass fans hoped to see evaporate were still present, as the Minutemen could not capitalize on any of their scoring chances to beat the Eagles' Tim Kelleher.

Still, there aren't any worries about scoring coming from the Minuteman camp.

"The offense will come, because obviously there is more skill [on this team]," Kuiper said. "We had some good chances," Cahoon said. "We'll score some goals."

Meanwhile, RPI is coming off a 5-1 loss to Boston University following its upset over Wisconsin. The Terriers thoroughly peppered Engineer netminder Nathan Marsters with 41 shots on goal, while Rensselaer could only muster 15 attempts in the opposite end. At 1-1-0 on the year, RPI will face-off tonight with UMass-Lowell before heading to Amherst.

Which squad will show up at the Mullins Center on Sunday? The RPI squad that outplayed the Badgers on their own home ice, or the squad that was taken to school by BU? Cahoon hopes it's simply a group that's "licking [its] wounds" from Lowell.

This will be the third consecutive season that the Minutemen and Engineers will face off, and the previous two contests proved to be heated, to say the least. In Nov. 2000, UMass traveled to Freshman forward Michael Mullen scored one goal in the 3-2 UMass exhibition loss to St. Francis Xavier. After a 6-2 defeat to Boston College last Sunday, he and the rest of the Minutemen will look to improve on their poor offensive play against RPI this Sunday night.

Troy, N.Y. and skated right into an offensive fury as Rensselaer dumped in six first-period goals to cruise to the easy 9-2 win. Tempers also flared in the game at Hudson Field House, as a first-period brawl resulted in the ejection of six players, including three Minutemen.

Last year's journey was not nearly as cruel to UMass, but the team still dropped a 3-2 overtime loss to the Engineers at the Rensselaer/HSBC Holiday Tournament. Tim Turner and Greg Mauldin put home scores for UMass, but a trickling shot by the Engineers' Ryan Shields gave RPI the victory and spoiled a solid 31-save outing by former Minuteman goaltender Mike Johnson.

"I thought last year we were better than them, and played better than them, but we didn't win the game," Kuiper said.

With this upcoming game and next Sunday's non-conference showdown with CCHA opponent Nebraska-Omaha, the Minutemen will continue to use the month of October to shuffle through their young, extensive roster to find the most cohesive unit. Cahoon says that the upcoming weekend could be vital for many of his troops to secure a steady spot in the lineup.

"Guys really want to get after it a little bit," he said. "For some guys, it might mean a lot in terms of what contribution they'll make down the road."

Do or die time for Minutewomen

UM hits road to face two A-10 foes

By Bob McGovern
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

After splitting wins and losses in back-to-back weekends of Atlantic 10 play it has officially become do or die time for the Massachusetts women's soccer team. This weekend puts the Minutewomen up against Duquesne (4-6-1, 1-3-1 A-10) and St. Bonaventure (8-5, 2-5 A-10), both of whom are vying to remove themselves from the mediocrity of the A-10 ranks.

Duquesne is experiencing somewhat of a lackluster season. Sitting near the bottom of the conference, its chances at a postseason berth are looking very slim.

On the offensive side of the ball, Duquesne has had trouble scoring (three goals in seven losses). The Minutewomen will have to watch for a very balanced scoring attack, rather than a single star player though. Duquesne exhibits offensive leadership from Lauren Bracco, Erica Carey and Erin Marshal, who each have four goals on the season. Duquesne has not won since its match against the Maroon and White's other opponent this weekend, St. Bonaventure, on Sept. 28.

The Bonnies bring a completely different look to the table than that of the Dukes. They have exhibited the ability to compete, and when they win, they tend to win big. With this in mind the Bonnies have not played nearly the schedule that the Maroon and White has undertaken. They have a better all around record than the Minutewomen but have shown similar success in the competitive A-10, both squads sporting a 2-3 record.

A major concern for the Maroon and White will have to be Lisa Nicola. She has led the Bonnies in scoring the last two seasons and remains on top with nine goals so far this season. On top of her prowess at the scoring end, she has also been a major distributor, dishing out a team-high six assists on the year. Complementing Nicola up front has been Lois Bennett and Erin Johnson, both of whom can put it into the net effectively.

Also proving to be an offensive force is A-10 Rookie of the Week, Heather Macdougall.

St. Bonaventure is coming off of a two-game conference win streak, defeating Temple and St. Joseph's. This weekend can similarly make or break the Bonnies as they face up against current A-10 powerhouse URI and the Minutewomen back to back. They have also been very effective when playing at home, only losing two contests this season.

After last weekend the Minutewomen have shown that they are quite competitive among the ranks of the A-10. The defense has been flourishing as of late while the offense has taken a back seat. They will be looking towards freshman standout Lindsey Bellini and veterans Martha Conover and Erin Lilly to put together a strong offensive stand this weekend.

As usual the Minutewomen have experienced a much more challenging schedule than either of their opponents. Most of the teams on Duquesne and St. Bonaventure's schedules are small conference opponents lacking the national recognition of say a Michigan or Auburn squad, both of which faced the Minutewomen this year. If this weekend turns out positive there may be a chance for post-season thoughts. If not, it's that time of the year where you start thinking about the future.

Police: firebomber of family was on probation

City rallies near burned-out shell of family's home

By Alex Dominguez
ASSOCIATED PRESS

BALTIMORE (AP) – Chanting "Thou shalt not kill," hundreds rallied Sunday near the burned-out shell of the house where an arson fire killed five children and their mother, who had fought to clear drug dealers from her neighborhood.

"The time has come for us not to just say those words but to live them," said Bishop Felton Edwin May, the head of the Baltimore Washington conference of the United Methodist Church.

Douglas Flowers said he attended the rally to show support "not only to the family, but also to the community and let the drug dealers know they will not prevail."

Darrel Brooks, 21, a man police say has a "drug history," has been charged with setting the fire early Wednesday that killed Angela Dawson; Carnell Dawson Jr., 10; Juan Ortiz, 12; twins Kevin and Keith Dawson, 9; and LaWanda Dawson, 14.

Prosecutors say Brooks kicked in the door to the Dawson home, poured gasoline on the floor and set it on fire.

Dawson's husband, Carnell Dawson Sr., 59, survived but suffered burns over 80 percent of his body and fractured his pelvis jumping from an upper floor window.

Investigators believe some people in the neighborhood were upset at calls the Dawsons made to police reporting a variety of offenses including drug dealing, police have said.

Brooks faces 29 charges including arson and first-degree murder. He appeared in court Friday and was ordered held without bail. Other arrests are possible, police said.

The house had been firebombed two weeks earlier, but the family escaped injury then. Police offered to move the Dawsons but were told they wanted to stay, Police Commissioner Edward Norris has said.

Brooks had been placed on probation in April for his conviction on a car-theft charge, but he never made contact with his probation office and the office never attempted to reach him, even though an officer was assigned to the case, said Stuart Simms, secretary of the Department of Public Safety and Correctional Services.

BALTIMORE (AP) – The man accused of starting a fire that killed an anti-drug crusading mother and her five children was on probation for a car-theft conviction but officers never made contact with him, an official said.

Darrell Brooks, 21, faces arson charges and six counts of first-degree murder in the blaze that engulfed Angela Dawson's three-story row house in a tough Baltimore neighborhood.

The Department of Public Safety and Correctional Services said Friday that an officer assigned to supervise Brooks, who was placed on probation in April, never tried to reach him even after he failed to make contact.

"No action was taken, no effort made to get him to report," said Stuart Simms, the department's secretary. "This is not within acceptable standards."

Simms said investigation was continuing and "staff will be held accountable."

Police say Dawson, who neighbors say had fought to clear drug dealers from her block, may have been targeted because of her efforts to rid the neighborhood of crime. They said more arrests were possible.

Court documents released Friday say Brooks had a "drug history" and that he kicked in Dawson's door Wednesday, poured gasoline on the floor and sparked the blaze.

Brooks shook his head Friday as 29 charges against him were read at a hearing where bail was denied. It wasn't clear if he had an attorney.

One witness saw Brooks set the fire, another said he admitted to starting the fire and a search of Brooks' bedroom found a pickle jar containing a liquid that appeared to be gasoline, the court documents said. Tests found the fire was started by gasoline.

The only survivor of the blaze was Dawson's husband, Carnell Dawson, 59, who was severely burned and fractured his pelvis jumping from an upper floor window to escape.

The house had been firebombed two weeks earlier, again in the middle of the night, but the family had escaped injury then. Police offered to move the Dawsons afterward, but they wanted to stay, police Commissioner Edward Norris said.

Police said investigators questioned Brooks about the first fire, but he wasn't charged. Stanton said Thursday that investigators were taking another look.

Court records detail problems the Dawson's had with other neighbors, including a case against one accused of assaulting Angela Dawson and spray-painting a curse on the side of the family's home.

Search for sniper continues

By Allen G. Breed
ASSOCIATED PRESS

ASHLAND, Va. (AP) – Authorities finished a painstaking search around a steakhouse where a 37-year-old man was wounded and said Sunday they assumed the attack was the work of the Washington-area sniper.

"We are acting as if it is and we will continue in that mode until we find out it is not," said Col. Stuart Cook of the Hanover County Sheriff's Department.

The victim was hospitalized in critical condition Sunday but doctors said they were cautiously optimistic.

Authorities said doctors had not yet managed to remove the bullet, which would be needed to establish a connection to the other shootings. Physicians planned more surgery and said they still might be able to recover the bullet.

"The prognosis is still guarded, but since he is a very healthy man and he is very young, the chances are fair to good, I would say," said Dr. Rao Ivatury, director of trauma and critical care at MCV Hospital in Richmond.

Police said the victim, whose name was not released, was shot outside a Ponderosa steakhouse Saturday night after he and his wife stopped in Ashland, a town of 6,500, for gas and food. His wife told authorities the shot sounded like a car backfiring and said her husband took about three steps before collapsing.

The sniper shootings began Oct. 2. The most recent confirmed sniper attack was the Monday night killing of FBI analyst Linda Franklin outside a Home Depot store in Falls Church.

If the Saturday night shooting were confirmed as related to the others, it would be the first time the sniper has attacked on a weekend, and it would break the longest lull between shootings, about five days.

It would be the farthest south the sniper has traveled – Ashland is about 85 miles south of Washington. Previously, the farthest the sniper had strayed from the Washington area was Spotsylvania County, about 50 miles south of Washington.

Dozens of officers conducted a methodical, inch-by-inch search Sunday of a wooded area near the restaurant. Cook refused to discuss what, if anything, officers had found.

"The leads have been numerous and we hope they continue," Cook told reporters during a briefing.

Some witnesses said they heard a shot coming from the woods, but nobody reported seeing the shooter.

Earlier, Ashland Police Chief Frederic Pleasants Jr. had said no evidence had been found during searches conducted immediately following the shooting.

The shooting victim underwent three hours of surgery late Saturday at MCV Hospital, hospital spokeswoman Pam Lepley said.

He was described as conscious Sunday but unable to talk because he was on a ventilator. Doctors had to remove his spleen and part of his stomach and pancreas, Ivatury said.

Ivatury said he couldn't comment on the condition of the bullet.

Unless the bullet is removed, officials can't conclusively determine whether it was fired from the same rifle used in 11 previous assaults – nine of them fatal – in Maryland, Virginia and Washington, D.C.

However, it may be possible at least to determine whether the bullet is the same size – .223-caliber – that was used in the earlier attacks, said Dr. Paul B. Ferrara, director of Virginia's Division of Forensic Science.

"It depends on the condition of the bullet and how badly fragmented it is," Ferrara said Sunday. "Sometimes a firearms expert can assess or approximate the caliber of weapon by looking at X-rays from different angles."

Pleasants said state police shut down Interstate 95 in the area immediately after the shooting was reported, as well as Route 54, where the Ponderosa is located, and Route 1, another major artery less than a quarter mile away.

"From the minute the call was received, a plan of action was put into place for setting up roadblocks," Hanover County Sheriff's Col. Stuart Cook said. "It was a rolling, continual thing."

Authorities have been on the lookout since early in the investigation for a white van with a ladder rack. However, Pleasants said that after interviewing witnesses police had no suspects and no clear description of a vehicle that could be placed at the scene of Saturday's shooting.

Russ Brickey, 26, a maintenance mechanic, said he had eaten at the Ponderosa many times and couldn't believe the violence had made its way to Ashland.

"This is like a high-tech Mayberry," Brickey said as he stood across the street from the restaurant. "Stuff like this isn't supposed to happen here – period."

Authorities in Maryland continued testing a shell casing found in a white rental truck to determine if it could be linked to the sniper attacks. Police said it would be at least Monday before they could announce whether the casing is connected to the shootings.

A source close to the investigation, however, said Sunday that "it has nothing to do with this case." The source, speaking on condition of anonymity, would not confirm reports that the shell was .30-caliber, a different size from the sniper's bullets, but said: "It's got caliber problems, it's got age problems."

Professor notes differences key in Middle East conflict

By Morris Singer
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Dr. Reuven Firestone, a professor at Hebrew Union College in Los Angeles, told a group of about 25 people in Thompson Hall yesterday that it is important to "acknowledge the religious requirements, expectations, and aspirations," of all parties involved in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

In his lecture, titled, "One Holy Land, Three Holy Peoples: Jewish, Christian and Islamic Regards for the 'Holy Land' and Their Impact on the Current Conflict," Firestone, who has a doctorate in Arabic and Islamic Studies and is an ordained rabbi, took the opportunity to survey a variety of sources in Jewish, Christian and Islamic texts. He introduced his lecture by stressing the importance of reading these texts.

"Too many times, people will stand out in front of you and tell you their views on controversial issues ... and often times, in my experience, [what they say] is not true," he said.

Although using significant amounts of historical texts from all three viewpoints in his lecture, Firestone did not offer a definitive answer as to who is the rightful owner of Israeli land, and more specifically Jerusalem.

"To whom is Jerusalem most holy: Jews, Muslims, Christians?" he asked his audience.

Firestone did not answer this question, but he did acknowledge that Jerusalem is a holy place to all three religions for many reasons. He followed this point by saying that weighing those reasons, religious reasons, is not what is going to end the disagreement.

"It's not religion that is going to solve this conflict. You want to get religion out of the conflict," he said.

He continued by saying that people have been using religion for a long time to make derogatory points in attempts to diminish the rights of others to live in the land.

"It's very childish. Its name calling, and it's happening today with a vengeance," he said.

Firestone said that understanding the needs of other religions as well as respecting their desires is the first step towards resolving the conflict. He feels that if people can do this, it is possible to make progress in negotiations that have been halted so many times.

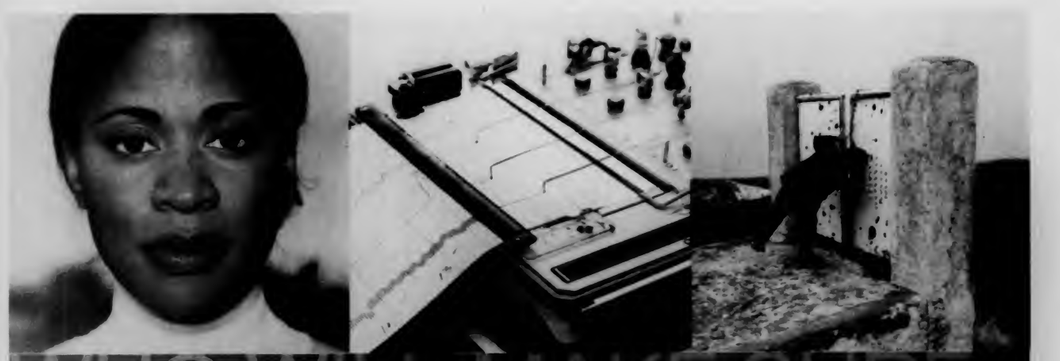
"I think they can get unstuck. It is possible to get unstuck," he said.

Perhaps the biggest issue, according to Firestone, is the establishment of trust. He said that trust is going to be hard to gain, on both sides, citing the consistent pattern of beliefs, both Israeli and Palestinian, that one side is going to fraud the other side once concessions are made.

As an example of this, Firestone said that Israelis believe that if they give up Jerusalem, they won't be allowed access to religious sites. This was the case before the Six Day War in 1967, when eastern Jerusalem was not part of Israel. Firestone thinks a lot of Israelis feel this will happen again.

Firestone suggested that the alternative to both sides attempting to gain trust is to wait and to continue on the current course with the current philosophies and policies.

"There's a belief on both sides that if they just stick it out, they're going to have it all," Firestone said.



He claimed that the Palestinians see Israel as having only been around for a short time, and because of this, the Palestinians feel they may see independence in another generation. He also said that Israelis think that if the situation becomes more oppressive in the West Bank and Gaza, or if the oppressive situation that currently exists continues for longer, eventually, the Palestinians will move to other parts of the world, including the United States.

Right now, Firestone says, both sides want the land in its entirety. He says that for any conflict to be resolved, both sides must realize that neither one can have the entire thing.

The event was sponsored in part by the Jewish Student Union.

UMass involved in Kilimanjaro findings

By Lindsay Kirkham
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

University of Massachusetts geoscientists are a part of a collaboration of researchers who announced last week that Africa's Mount Kilimanjaro's famed ice caps are disappearing.

The project, funded by the National Science Foundation, involves a team of researchers comprised of UMass and Ohio State University (OSU) scientists. The Massachusetts team is assigned to study current conditions by tracking weather and monitoring the glaciers; the OSU researchers are examining ice cores to gain insight into the mountain's climate and environmental past.

"It's important to consider both the contemporary situation as well as the mountain's history, in order to better understand the way in which the glaciers are responding to current climate change. Having both pieces of the puzzle enables us to put each other's findings into context," said Douglas Hardy, who is in charge of the UMass section of the undertaking.

Predictions in an article of the Oct. 18 issue of Science magazine highlight the research and estimate that the glaciers on Africa's tallest mountain will be completely obliterated between 2015-2020, a first in virtually 12,000 years. Using aerial photograph technology, an 80 percent decrease in glacier surface area between 1912 and 2000 is estimated.

The UMass scientists have been measuring mass changes on the glaciers with three consecutive trips to the summit between February 2000 and July 2002. In that comparatively short amount of time, a discernible decrease in both the surface area and thickness of the glaciers has been noted.

"We are working urgently to understand the dramatic retreat of glaciers currently underway on Kilimanjaro before the evidence—and the historical record - disappear," said Hardy.

In addition to observing the physical properties of the glaciers, the UMass team examines information sent from a weather station at the mountain's peak to a campus computer via satellite transmitter every several hours. The station records variables including: air temperature, humidity, solar radiation, wind speed and direction, barometric pressure and changes in surface height of ice caps.

"The weather station gives us a comprehensive, real-time look at the meteorological situation on Kilimanjaro's summit," said Hardy. "All of these weather elements, and the interplay between them, play a role in the glacier's health."

The dramatic decline, from nearly 20 square kilometers of glaciers in the late 19th century to 2.6 square kilometers only one hundred years later is believed to be the increase in global temperatures. But, Hardy points out that it's difficult to ascribe the decrease solely to humans.

Hardy believes that further investigation is necessary before attributing cause for the demise, and that blaming global warming as the reason without adequate diagnostic proof is problematic.

"Evidence is mounting that human influences on climate are causing glaciers to retreat dramatically, around the world and especially at high elevations in the tropics, but Kilimanjaro's glaciers have little in common with mid-latitude Alpine glaciers and we must accept that simple explanations are not always possible. Kilimanjaro is a mountain that defies expectations and shatters assumptions."

School spirit:

Needs to start with the students

[illegible] weekend, the twenty-ninth ranked Minutemen faced off against [illegible] Alabama in front of McGuirk Alumni Stadium.

[illegible] was also Band Day as over fifty high school bands from across [illegible] made their way to the friendly confines of Amherst. Both the marching band as the Maroon and White faithful were treated to one of the best [illegible] that far this season.

[illegible] the Atlantic 10's best were back and ready for the full 60 minutes. [illegible] championship in doubt until the very end. The Wildcats missed an extra [illegible] more than three minutes to go, making the score 17-16 in favor of the Minutemen, and UMass seemed to be in command. However, two minutes [illegible] interception later, Villanova was attempting a 36 yard field goal [illegible] with UMass special teams blocked the kick, sealed the victory, and [illegible] 1,000 fans home happy.

The potential of an amazing game helped to draw in those fans and after [illegible] win, the Minutemen are almost certain to reach the A-10 championship this year. Many more people will probably attend the home games for the rest of the season. While it's easy to support a team that is on a winning streak, it's a lot tougher to stick by a team that's consistently not doing well.

Groups on campus such as the athletic department, administration and the Student Government Association have been searching for ways to raise school spirit. These include putting a ticket booth in the Campus Center, an SGA referendum question on selling beer in the Mullins Center and discussing the possibility of bringing back tailgating. These are good ideas and will probably help more students to athletic events. Unfortunately, it still doesn't get at the heart of the issue: the attitudes of the student body.

The lack of school spirit becomes even clearer during home games when [illegible] are flooded with fans from the visiting team. In the A-10 fans from schools such as Temple University, St. Joseph's College and Hofstra University are [illegible] for their devotion. Sometimes the visiting team's fans are louder [illegible] than those in the Mullins Center and McGuirk stadium. Many of those fans [illegible] the hours to follow their team, and set the Minutemen don't have this [illegible] of following. It's a sad picture, especially in comparison to the [illegible] effort exhibited at other large state schools that have just as many students. Can a large campus like ours' school spirit should be just as evident.

By nature it seems students at UMass are more committed to professional [illegible] teams than they are to our own school's team. For example, just because the Red Sox or the Yankees are out of the running for the World [illegible] doesn't mean we would abandon either team in the post season.

This is a real shame.

We at The Collegian strongly encourage students to support UMass athletic teams, win or lose. When our team wins we celebrate their victory by [illegible] more and attending more games. But whenever our team is failing [illegible] students attend less games and there is almost complete silence in the crowd as our teams loses.

They deserve better.

Whether we are there for them or not, our athletes still proudly don the [illegible] and white each game representing our school wherever they go. Those athletes are more than just people who are playing sports for the school [illegible] our fellow classmates, who deserve our attention and respect no matter what their performance is. We should be proud of the effort that our [illegible] put into their sports and be there to support them from their pre-games [illegible] their season is over.

To teach or not to teach

SOONE

[illegible] weeks ago, [illegible] attended a meeting [illegible] my non-Jewish friends [illegible] collecting and shipping [illegible] supplies [illegible] the troops [illegible] a huge list of [illegible] particular, after seeing [illegible] advertising and [illegible] Mailing Communications [illegible] 2 columns. I was offered [illegible] flyers to take into [illegible] school. The half-hour presentation [illegible] regarding sex education in schools. The half-hour presentation [illegible] regarding sex education in schools. The half-hour presentation focused on the debate between safe sex advocates and [illegible] abstinence-only education for young people.

The group prominently displayed a photo of unprotected [illegible] where students who were about to [illegible] the ultimate attitude regarding sex education in their school system town.

These students explained that [illegible] were their peers, [illegible] being pressured and threatened rather than being taught. They also were directly impacted by the [illegible] of no sex education, their other has a sexually transmitted disease rate [illegible] higher than other [illegible] in the United States. The reason, in the adults' eyes, [illegible] of the community to recognize this problem. [illegible] themselves that different group and tell them [illegible] from an organization that would teach students in [illegible] situation what they needed to know about having safe [illegible] regarding sex.

I was extremely appalled by the attitudes and [illegible] taken by the adults of this community, and [illegible] discouraged by the predominance of abstinence [illegible] education in schools over [illegible] comprehensive [illegible] that help students. In fact, [illegible] and his administration support many [illegible] abstinence education and other programs which teach young people about making safe decisions if they [illegible] decide to have sex.

> "...exposing young people to information that will help them make some of the most important decisions in their lives can only be a good thing."

This is where the controversy comes into play. Advocates of "Stay Again Virgin" associations, religious groups that unconditionally oppose sexual relations with [illegible] under all circumstances and abstinence-only education feel that teaching teenagers about sex will only increase problems by encouraging the teens to engage in sexual [illegible]. Needless to say, I feel [illegible] position is absolutely ridiculous and has no merit whatsoever. As one of the students involved in the safe sex program stated, just because you teach someone how to use a fire extinguisher doesn't mean they will [illegible] a fire. If marijuana was legal, would more people smoke?

No, it would, were legal would less people drink? No. Likewise, without teaching students how to protect themselves, how to make safe decisions, know the positive and negative consequences of their actions and value their own bodies will not make more teens make sex. How can knowledge ever be a bad thing?

Our society still considers sex a taboo topic, one in which should not be discussed prominently and one that is still embarrassing and inappropriate. It seems ignorant, then, to be afraid to talk about issues that ultimately impact a lot of lives and can have negative consequences on many people's lives. The ever-present, unfortunate image of women expected to be pure and virginal, while males are often encouraged to partake in sexual activities games over the media. As mentioned on the MTV special, male female singers as Jessica Simpson and Britney Spears were commended over and over for their virgin status, while female sexuality is looked down upon. It is extremely unfortunate that such media images exist in our culture, but that they are more highly respected and recognized in the mental way of behavior.

It is important to remember that while most of us here at UMass are educated individuals who are probably aware of safe sex issues, there are many people in this country who are without adequate resources to information. I am lucky enough to have open minded understanding parents and friends who are willing to help me through relationship issues and discuss topics regarding sexuality. I have also been provided with information about where I should go if I ever have a problem and what the outcomes of different actions should be for me and my future. Not everyone has supportive informed parents or knowledgeable friends and doctors. That is why it is so important to encourage safe sex education, which explains the use of condoms, the risks involved with sexual relations and how to develop the self-confidence to trust your own decisions and only participate in sexual activities when you are mature and ready.

I feel that teaching someone to swim is one of life's greatest accomplishments. Not only is it a life skill that eliminates immediate danger in aqueous situations, it also gives individuals a sense of how dangerous water can be and shows them that learning is a process. Similarly, exposing young people to information that will help them make some of the most important decisions in their lives can only be a good thing. Abstinence is a good option, but it is just that: an option. Once someone knows about the risks, they can then decide if they want to partake in the activity, unsafely, safely, wait, or forget it altogether. There is a place for virtues and value in schools and in sex education, but to assume that one can use sex as being a caring, intelligent individual who understands that their behavior can have great effects on themselves and others.

[illegible] and employee. I have been on this campus [illegible] years. I have seen a lot of outrageous [illegible] which were very funny. But as an employee of the Landscape Services for the last three years, I see nothing something that isn't very funny at all. [illegible] a very sad kind of sad. The vandalism of the [illegible] trees on campus. As a forestry professionals [illegible] more of the right kind of words to [illegible] I can't understand how someone can be [illegible] by the sight of a tree to the extent they would [illegible] Many of the trees I have discovered damaged [illegible] in such a way that it had to be deliberate [illegible].

[illegible] is considered an arboretum. The [illegible] are not only there to reduce the eyesore of [illegible] and blacktop, but also as teaching [illegible] trees that are planted are to replace specimens [illegible] in the region. Often these are planted to [illegible] a specialty, such as an dedication to a [illegible] for their abilities to [illegible] and different varieties to the landscape. The [illegible] are also planted to [illegible] hard, dirty to [illegible] campus. The patchwork maple tree on [illegible] side of Hasbrouck was the latest victim. [illegible] tree was purchased with one tone [illegible] to add to the beautification committee [illegible] especially dedicated to [illegible] It is rugged as that as they are there [illegible] except those of total equality in Israel. One should [illegible] to see its Knesset profile. Arab Israelis currently hold [illegible] seats in the government. This shows the promise of a [illegible] democracy, one that can be counted on always as a [illegible] for the United States.

I have never met a single, decent, human being who does not feel their heart break for the Palestinian situation. It is incredibly unfortunate that the money and aid Yasser Arafat receives from the United States does not help the Palestinian people, but himself and his agenda (which is not an agenda of peace). Not all Palestinian people have turned to homicide bombings as a way out. Not all Palestinians blow up innocent civilians on buses on their way to work, in restaurants during family dinners, in hotels on sacred holidays. But most Palestinians do want peace, many want their leadership to be credible and many are only offered work in Israel so they can feed their children.

A divestment campaign against Israel has nothing to do with creating peace. The word 'peace' is not even mentioned in the petitions. The attempt to delegitimize Israel is obvious with this campaign, almost blaming Israel for the entire conflict. Divestment in the case of Israel is ridiculous, pointless and harmful to the United States, but it just shows how little education there is about the subject- perhaps everyone should read up on their facts before they sign their name to an illegitimate campaign.

To the Editor:

I am writing in response to Lindsey Elder's Oct. 15 column, "Capital punishment: A viable option." While I respect Ms. Elder's opinion, I believe it is based on common and mistaken assumptions about the death penalty; below, I examine several of them.

"Massachusetts is one of only 12 states in the nation that does not enforce the death penalty." This is true, and it does give the impression that the absence of capital punishment in this state is a deviation from the norm. However, such is not the case when one considers the bigger picture. According to Amnesty International, a total of 110 countries, or more than half in the world, "have now abolished the death penalty in law or practice;" as for the remaining 84, "the number of countries which actually execute prisoners in any one year is much smaller." When viewed globally, capital punishment, and not its absence, becomes the aberration.

"There is a need in society for there to be a certain respect, and a healthy fear of the legal system for it to thrive." Ms. Elder is arguing that capital punishment is an effective deterrent. However, study after study has shown this not to be the case. For example, "A New York Times survey, released in September 2000, found that during the last 20 years, the homicide rate in states with the death penalty has been 48 percent to 101 percent higher than in states without the death penalty." In addition, "FBI data showed that 10 of the 12 states without capital punishment have homicide rates below the national average." The death penalty would be a deterrent only if all murders were a result of cold, calculated action; while this applies to some murders, it is by far the exception rather than the norm. As Amnesty International explains it, "The threat of execution at some future date is unlikely to enter the minds of killers acting under the influence of drugs and/or alcohol, or who are in the grip of fear or rage, or who are panicking while committing another crime (such as a robbery), or who suffer from mental illness or mental retardation and do not fully understand the gravity of their crime." While this does not in any way justify murder, it clearly shows that the death penalty does not deter crime.

"Who cares about the accused when the accused is someone being brought up for charges of murdering a neighbor, a child or a complete stranger in cold blood?" First, there again is the assumption that murder is always committed in cold blood; this is not true (see above). Second, Ms. Elder does not consider the very real possibility that criminals, too, have friends and family members who care deeply for them. I do not see how depriving someone of a loved one is ever just; that is why I oppose both murder and capital punishment (which are, in essence, one and the same).

Lastly, Ms. Elder mentions the recent Supreme Court ruling stating "that juries, not judges, must make the determination whether the convicted is to be executed or not." While I support the court's decision, it is a mistake to assume that juries are flawless in their judgment. Consider this: According to the A.C. Nielsen Co., "the average American watches more than four hours of TV each day." A study done at the University of Michigan and appearing in the spring issue of the Journal of Communication examined 116 "breaking news programs" on seven commercial television stations "covering Los Angeles and Orange counties during an eight-month period in 1995-96."

The results were stunning: "nearly 73 percent more blacks and about 38 percent more Latinos than whites were portrayed as criminals. Also, blacks were about 2.5 times more likely and Latinos almost twice as likely as whites to be depicted as felons (e.g., murderers, rapists, armed thieves, arsonists, etc.)" When it comes to television, minorities are portrayed in a negative light far more often than not; with four hours of TV a day, it is inevitable that the stereotypes and falsehoods we regularly witness take root inside us, especially since an enormous majority of Americans get their news from mainstream media sources.

Therefore, it is not entirely unreasonable to assume, expect, and even that an ordinary jury composed of ordinary TV viewers will operate under commonly held mistaken beliefs, thereby compromising justice.

The death penalty is a complicated issue with no easy answers. However, I do believe that a careful examination of the facts shows it to be unjust. We must ask ourselves: can a culture saturated with negative stereotypes create and maintain a fair and equitable justice system?

The answer, I believe, is no. Until the justice system is fully purged of bias and unfairness, I don't see how it ever will be entrusting it with human life is beyond unreasonable; it is insane.

Yume Bitsu improvises a Golden Vessyl of Sound

By Mike Barrett

YUME BITSU
The Golden Vessyl Of Sound
K Records

In my perception of the human collective unconscious, there's a bucolic world, of lush valleys, fields, rivers and forests we all feel a need to reconnect and/or retreat to. Here there is warmth and peace. Everyday is perfect, like a Sunday afternoon in early October. The sun plays softly across fields of tall grasses, swaying lazily in a cool breeze.

This is where Yume Bitsu's fourth album, Golden Vessyl Of Sound takes me; to that special "safe place," away from everything, and I really mean it. When I first started listening to this CD all that came to mind was getting my headphones and running into the fields behind my parents' house to try to find the blissful world that these nine songs tell about.

All of the songs on this album were completely improvised (jammed live in the studio, for the layman in the audience), and the fact that these songs sound as tight and cohesive as they do is a testament to the huge talent of this band. Yume Bitsu utes a brief, almost mythical, narrative to build the album around. A tale of the Mothpeople, and the destruction they wrought upon the Elders and the land of Dryystn. Some fans should

Styles is more gangster than gentleman

By Bill Boyce
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

STYLES
Gangster and a Gentleman
Interscope Records

Styles' solo debut Gangster and A Gentlemen is okay at its best. There are some great songs on this album that really show off his wide array of talent. There are also some ugly and appalling songs that are awful. The gangster portion the album title fits his music perfectly. The gentlemen part does not. There is no sign of a gentleman on this album. Gunshots in the background of most of your songs and rapping about killing people do not constitute a gentleman. Styles' intro also will not sell anyone on the gentlemen idea as he curses about fifteen times in thirty seconds. Forget the gentlemen part. A Gangster would be a perfect title for this album.

"Good Times" is a great song, the best one on this album. It has been receiving a lot of radio play for a reason. The rhymes are insane and the chorus clearly grabs your attention. Now for everyone who does not know, "Good Times" is the song with the chorus about getting high. If you want to hear the real version of "Good Times" you will have to go out and buy the CD. Due to the popularity of the song, Styles had to change the chorus from "I get high" to "I get by" so it would be radio friendly.

Many songs on this album talk about his life and his hard struggles

RUNNING with SCISSORS

Episode II: Clothes make the man

By Melissa Hammel and Lizzy Nielsen

Thought we were gone? Guess again. The lovely ladies of "Running with Scissors" are back again this week after damn Christopher Columbus put our column on hold last week. This week we tackle the next most important aspect after cologne, and that is dress. We will again offer our opinions on what we like and what we think looks good.

There is something to be said for the importance of dressing well. Yes, we understand, we are all college students and waking up in the morning and trying to look like a supermodel is not for everyone. However, it is important to go to class in clean clothes. That means socks too. You never know who you could bump into while wandering across campus with dirty smelly clothes looking as though you just rolled out of bed.

The first article of clothing that will be tackled today are khaki pants. They are multi-purpose, and often omit the vibe that you're dressed up, but you didn't try too hard. Khaki cargos, like those available at Old Navy or if you have a few more bucks, Banana Republic, can make any outfit look a little nicer. If you're using khakis for a dress up occasion, be sure to wear ones with pleats, not cargos, and for the love of everything holy, IRON, IRON, IRON. Khakis look nice, but not if they look like they've been lying on the floor since last Christmas. Be careful when eating too, it really sucks if you drop a meatball on your lap when you're wearing light colored pants.

We are not forgetting about jeans, Jeans are wonderful in their own way, they have that casual feel to them that can give off a polished feel to them if they the right fit. There are a couple of types of jeans to avoid; these include the kind that are ripped to oblivion to the point in which it looks like you got into a fight with a rabid dog before you arrived on campus and dirty, stained pairs of jeans. Otherwise anything that isn't too short or too baggy should do nicely.

Now the best way to top off a pair of freshly ironed khakis or jeans is a nice sweater. Since winter is approaching the chilly fall air makes sweaters both stylish and practical. There is a trick to sweaters however. You are wasting your time if you decide to wear something that resembles your grandmother's couch. While the cabled hand-knitted sweater look was really popular in second grade it went out of style when we reached puberty.

A good style to try is a fitted sweater. It maintains an air of casual yet sexy, and it shows off a toned upper body like nothing else. It also makes a semi-toned body look a great deal better than it really is. If you really don't have the body to wear a fitted sweater I would go with baggy, sometimes that is simply better than looking like you need to wear a bra.

Sweaters are pretty much a no-brainer when it comes to colors and tones. Royal or navy blues are popular during the winter months as well as colors in the gray and black family. Avoid colors such as lime green and pink as well as white; no one wants to see you looking like the bride in a wedding party.

Another solid top selection to wear with khakis or jeans would be the button down shirt. Button down shirts are multi-purpose as well, they can dress up an outfit if they're tucked in, or they can be used for casual purposes if they are left untucked. Plaids are nicest, but solids are nice as well. Again, IRON. Or at least buy some of the sprays and hang stuff that takes wrinkles out for you. The shower method also works fairly well for the lazy, run the shower and hang up your shirt outside of it. As long as you don't hang it close enough to fall into the shower it should be wrinkle free in no time due to the steam. Done wrong you could have soaking clothing, so follow this advice at your own risk.

Cotton button-downs can be tricky to keep in wearable shape, but avoid leaving them in the dryer for extended periods of time, and hang them up as soon as they are done with the wash. When we speak of button down shirts, we do not mean flannel. Flannel is grandpa or pajamas, and the word flannels make men look like college educated wino.

Button down shirts can also work as a classy addition to the sweater. Simply wear your button down shirt underneath the sweater for a "I just graduated from Harvard look." Honestly, it really isn't best for casual days-to-classroom wear however if you are say going on a formal date or to meet someone else's parents you can show that you are willing to go the extra mile by pairing up the buttoned down and sweater with the pair of khaki's.

To top off a classy, but an "I didn't try too hard look," try a nice leather belt, but make sure it matches your shoes. There's nothing worse than a black belt with brown shoes or vice versa. Sneakers are wonderful too as long as they are kept relatively clean, but try to invest in some multi purpose dress-ish shoes, just because they add class to any ensemble.

Slowly but surely, the women of "Running with Scissors" are trying to give men a clue about what women are really looking for. Sure, you can call us shallow. But we're also right.

CARMELINA'S serves up savory Italian cuisine

Carmelina's on Hadley offers tasty Italian cuisine in a traditional New England setting. Carmelina's is open Tuesday thru Saturday from 5 p.m. till 10 p.m.

By Jocelyn Keith and Lauren Weinstein
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENTS

It's that restaurant that catches your eye along side route 9. It is always festively decorated for the season, especially autumn. Carmelina's Ristorante is located before the Coolidge Bridge across from Hadley Auto Service and Hapco Auto Parts. This brown and green restaurant, which once was a house, captivates the essence of what comes to mind when you think of New England. The inside of Carmelina's is not what you are expecting to encounter. Artsy and appealing scenery unfolds before you. The bar area separates the restaurant into two separate rooms, each with its own unique feel. The room that we were seated in was our favorite of the two. The piano at the far corner of the room sets the tone for a classy and beautiful atmosphere while the hues of deep oranges, browns and reds enhance the New England motif. To add to the tranquil setting, there are tropical fish tanks at the entrance of the room and arches encompassing the painted walls. As you sit down at your table, you will notice a fresh picked flower bouquet and excellent mood music.

Damien DiPaola is the owner as well as the chef of Carmelina's, which opened in 1985. He grew up in the North End of Boston, which shaped his love and background for food. Carmelina's was a low-income business investment made by DiPaola, which turned out to be a lasting and worthwhile venture. He takes a lot of pride in his restaurant, assuring us that he has the freshest food that is "grade A, top dollar." In addition, the seafood from Boston that he uses at Carmelina's is sushi grade quality, which he has learned to obtain after many years in the business.

To start off the meal off right, toasted white bread accompanies balsamic vinaigrette for dipping. The menu is then placed in front of you and endless possibilities are available. Carmelina's specializes in seafood and pasta, however they have a fabulous array of other tantalizing dishes including salads, meats and poultry. Due to the excellent service that we encountered, DiPaola arranged for us to try various menu items. The appetizer that we tasted was the roasted shiitake. This was a version of polenta, which we learned was cornmeal cooked in chicken broth. Although this description may not sound very appealing, in reality it was exceptional. The other appetizer that we tried was a Portobello salad. The combination of the mushrooms, fresh mozzarella, tomato and roasted pine nuts was delectable.

For the entrée portion of our meal, we had the tortellini dish, which included julienne chicken. Being pasta lovers, we liked this dish and recommend it to anyone who enjoys good quality Italian cooking. We then were given the chicken piccata entrée to taste. The chicken was in a white wine and lemon sauce and had wonderful texture. To top the meal off we then had a piece of their black garlic beef. This portion of filet mignon was delicious. Each bite we took totally impressed us especially the sweet, tangy sauce that the meat was cooked in. Although it is hard to believe that we actually had room left for two desserts to try, we found a way because they sounded amazing. We had crème brulee and the white chocolate soufflé. Their names don't even do justice to the actual flavor. Each dessert was scrumptious and mouth watering and without a doubt, homemade.

Expect to find a mixed crowd of college students and locals at Carmelina's. Although the restaurant is not priced for the typical college student, the quality of the food is worth every penny. A meal will set you back about twenty dollars. Carmelina's atmosphere is perfect for a romantic date, a celebratory dinner or a place to take the parents. The hours of Carmelina's are Tuesday through Sunday 5-10 pm. For your listening pleasure, on Friday and Saturday nights a piano player performs.

Reservations are available and recommended.

be familiar with the slots line form the side project band Surface Of Event's CD from last fall. Mind you, there are no hokey medieval passages of elfin battles or tales of heroic valor.

Those are songs built by musicians that know their instruments well even down to the finest details of how each effect pedal works. Blissful washes of guitar and analogue synth drone in and out of the speakers, the singer's voice (no players are named on the album) hums and whispers in a tone that hits it's mark like one of Cupid's arrows, or could make any one drift into a long, peaceful sleep.

There are no song titles, either. "Song One" opens the album with soft guitars, drums, synths and trumpet and the mysterious and simple mantra "We Are," one of the few lyrics on the album. From here Yume Bitsu works on various concepts of tone and style, letting each song build it's own tone and pace. Songs "One," "Two," and "Three" rifs on guitar work and percussion more than others, the seven-minute "Song Four" and the album's 18-minute opus "Song Six" spotlight analogue synthesizers in all their spaced-out glory, man. The most striking songs on the album are definitely the first four, and the closing track "Song Nine," completely breaks the mold the rest of the album was cast from. "Song Nine" is the closest thing to a pop song that Yume Bitsu delivers, except that there's no verse/chorus/verse lyrical structure, and that the song is over eight minutes long.

Knowing the improvisational history of their song writing, the listener can see where this started: a fun, choppy beat form a synth, add a glittery and warm guitar riff, let the keyboardist have his or her way for a measure or two, then let the other guitarist come in and solo away, using the crunchy, reverbed tone that drives this album. Build to crescendo, and delve into regretless joy. I almost cry whenever I listen to this song. If you were making a mix for a special some one, in a High Fidelity style, I'd start or end the tape with this song, nah, end the tape, there's a little too much weirdo-jamming going on for it to be the attention getter, anyway.

Las Vegas continues to suck

MTV brings trashy TV to new low

LIZZY NIELSEN

Yup, here I am again. Back to give out my two (or three, or four) cents about this season of MTV's "Real World." As the season continues to steadily suck, and just when I didn't think it could get any worse, last week's episode exceeded my expectations of crap.

The main focus of this week's half hour of soft-core porn is yes, roommates that hook up and other roommates and get violent when they are jealous. So Steven and Trishelle are re-writing the book on how to be an awful roommate, with rule one being have sex when your roommate is sleeping in the room. They execute this rule perfectly, waking up poor Frank with the "slapping" and finally retiring to the confessional so they can continue to hang without being interrupted. Little do we know that this makes Brynn extremely unhappy.

So Brynn, instead of being a rational and normal person, lets all of this stew up inside her because she believes that she should be hooking up with Steven, and a few days later everything comes to a boil and Brynn stabs Steven with a fork. And people say there's a lack of solid entertainment in television today.

Steve, rightfully so, gets a little upset and calls Brynn every four letter word that has ever existed, and says he wants her out of the house. All the other roommates agree that this is Steven's decision. Steven wants her out, and doesn't want to deal with it. It all ends lovey and sappy, and Brynn ends up being able to stay as Steven says she reminds him of how he used to act when he was younger. So everyone kisses and makes up and everything is all puppies and flowers until the next time Steven and Trishelle get nasty and Brynn gets pissed. What's she going to stab him with next time? A spatula? Tune in next week to find out.

After writing my column last week, I realized I think I should have addressed the Irulan and Marc situation a little deeper. Let me just put out there that I think that Marc is the stereotypical scumbag horndog, and this guy shouldn't be allowed to manage a McDonald's, never mind a trendy, well received Vegas nightclub. When you are the boss, playing nicies with your co-workers is a bad idea. In fact, having relationships with people you work with is a bad idea. Marc gets Irulan drunk and then proceeds to try to seduce her into watching porn in his bed. Slick. I'm not saying that Irulan is innocent in this at all. There is no legit reason why she should have let herself get to such a point with such a disgusting excuse for a human being such as Marc. If you're willing to go up to a guy's hotel room and watch porn, he's going to make certain assumptions. This still isn't what makes me the maddest.

In the meeting the next day Marc and all his dirty sweat stained glory (did anyone else see the nasty pit stains on his shirt when he had his arms up in the air?), instructed the cast that they are not to drink on the job because he doesn't want to be "bad boss." Later on, Steven sits Marc down about his lewd behavior with all the women in the house, and Marc's like "I don't want to duck pay." blah, blah, blah. Marc is a sad little man with a severe overcompensation complex, and when he gets rejected for sex by all of the women in the house, he decides that he's going to be a jackass and try to use his power as boss to overcompensate for his lack of success with the ladies. Marc is a wretched excuse for a boss and an even worse excuse for a human being.

This season is the saddest excuse for bad television. MTV has truly stooped to a new low that I thought was not possible after this summer's "Sorority Life." They sell off drama as petty talking behind the back and Frank referring to Arissa as the "black bitch." Although that last comment was the wrong thing to say, Frank didn't mean anything by it, and it was just a comment that shouldn't have been made and Arissa flies off the handle about it and refuses to let it go. Wow, grudges on the "Real World." So creative. Between bosses that are walking sexual harassment cases, hypersensitive and horny cast members and assault with kitchen utensils, this season keeps lifting the bar for waste of life.

Guest conductors appear with UMass wind bands Wednesday

The University of Massachusetts Wind Ensemble and Symphony Band will be performing at 8 p.m. on Wednesday Oct. 23 in the Fine Arts Center Concert Hall. Two guest conductors, Jeffrey Holmes and Larry Harper, will conduct the concert. Professor Malcolm W. Rowell Jr., who had been the director of bands for 18 years at UMass, retired last May.

Jeffrey Holmes has been the Director of the African-American Music and jazz studies program at the UMass since 1979. He also conducts the University Jazz Ensemble I and Studio Orchestra. He has been a two-time winner of the National Endowment for the Arts Grant in Jazz Composition and has twice won the National Association of Jazz Educators Composition Contest. His compositions, arrangements, and performance can be heard on recordings with the Tillis/Holmes Jazz Duo, the Valley Big Band, Sonny Costanzo Big Band and the 16-piece Jeff Holmes Big Band.

Larry Harper is an associate professor at Carroll College in Waukesha, Wisc., as well as their director of bands and chair of the music department. Harper also founded and conducts the Wind Symphony at Carroll College, which the American Record Guide called "top quality" and said Harper was "a stickler for detail, a motivator and a first-rate musician who brings nuance and insight to a piece of music."

Jeffrey Holmes will conduct William Schuman's "George Washington Bridge" and his own composition, "Passage." Schuman, an American composer, wrote "George Washington Bridge" in 1950.

Larry Harper will be conducting Shostakovich's "Festival Overture, Op. 96" and sections one through thirteen of Carl Orff's "Carmina Burana." Shostakovich, a Russian composer wrote the "Festival Overture" in 1954. Orff's "Carmina Burana" was originally written for chorus and orchestra, but has been transcribed for wind ensemble by John Krance.

Tickets for this event are $5 for students, children under 18 and senior citizens, and $10 for the general public. Tickets can be purchased at the Fine Arts Center Box Office (413-545-2511).

on the streets of New York. Songs like "My Life" portrays his life vividly. "My Life" is an incredible song and the final track on the album. If there is one song on this album that discusses his struggles, this is it. The chorus is tight, smooth, and creative. The beat is sick and features some great rhymes.

Also check out his song "Black Magic" which features Angie Stone. This is another song that shows Styles' struggles throughout his life. Angie Stone has a powerful voice and she really makes the chorus shine. This song also has a strong beat that you can play over and over again and still not get tired of listening to it.

Those were some other decent songs, but now onto the distasteful parts of the album. Many songs are either loaded with curses or have guns being fired in the background. One song that I found hard to listen to was "Get Paid" which features young children singing in the chorus. "Get Paid" has gangster written all over it. The chorus has kids singing and is followed by Styles cursing and talking about drugs. A terrible and distasteful skit is the next track on the album. It is unclear on what the intentions of the skit were, but it wasn't good. The skit opens with noises sounding like a gun being shot.

There are also 24 tracks on the album, which is way too many for a person to listen to in one sitting. The album would be better if there were only 12 or 13 tracks on it. Many of the songs are repetitive which become boring to listen to. The skits on the album are not funny and they should have been taken out all together.

Another song that is downright terrible is "Soul Clap." The beats and the rhymes do not work well with each other. Also if you listen closely in the chorus there is yet another reference to gun use. To express your views about guns in one song is one thing but to constantly do it, well it gets redundant after a while.

Overall, this album gets a B-. Styles has a lot of potential to be a great solo rapper. He just needs focus less on stupid skits and put more emphasis on what he is good at, rapping.

Engineering the victory

Vitek's late goal gives UMass first win of the season

By Andy Vogt
COLLEGIAN STAFF

For two periods, the Massachusetts hockey team was obliterating Rensselaer goaltender Kevin Kurk with a deluge of shots, but could only muster two goals on the feisty junior.

JERALDIN LINCA/COLLEGIAN
Matt Anderson notched two assists as the Minutemen defeated RPI 4-3.

UMass	4

But UMass Head Coach Don Cahoon had a piece of advice for his young squad.

"One of the objectives was not to play the score but to play the game," Cahoon said about recovering from the deficit.

And the Maroon and White did just that, as two early third-period lamp-lighters catapulted UMass (1-1-0) to a 4-3 victory over the visiting Engineers. The sophomore tandem of Jeff Lang and Tim Vitek scored 55 seconds apart in the final period to give the Minutemen their much-needed first victory of the season.

Vitek took a cross-ice feed from Lang down the left side, and fired a rocket over the left shoulder of Kurk that proved to be the game-winning goal.

"I put myself in a pretty good position," Vitek said. "[Kurk] was really leaning on that right pass, and that left side was wide open."

Less than a minute prior to Vitek's goal, Lang found the back of the net after taking Matt Anderson's face-off win and wristing the puck top-shelf over Kurk. The two points Lang registered were his first in a UMass uniform after being held scoreless all of last year.

Winer picked up his first career victory despite allowing three goals on 12 shots. Still, Cahoon commended his rookie netminder for keeping focus in a contest in which he saw very little action.

"It was a tough game to play for a goaltender," Cahoon said. "It was a real mental challenge, probably as difficult as facing a lot of rubber." Winer made two key stops as well in the final minute after the Engineers pulled Kurk for an extra attacker.

For Rensselaer, the defeat marked its third straight loss after opening the season with a surprising 5-1 victory over Wisconsin. The Engineers dropped an 8-4 decision to UMass-Lowell on Friday night.

"It was pretty obvious we didn't play a full 60 minutes, especially in the third period where you need to finish strong," RPI Head Coach Dan Fridgen said.

Rensselaer, however, appeared to be in great shape toward the end of the first period, as they held a 2-0 lead over the Minutemen. Nolan Graham stole an errant pass on the tail end of a UMass power play and broke in alone on Winer. Graham's wrister clanked off the crossbar, but after a short discussion with the goal judge, referee Conrad Hache ruled the puck had crossed the goal line as well.

The Engineers made it 2-0 when C.J. Hanafin raced down the right side, made a cut past UMass defenseman Marvin Degon, and fired a nifty backhand past the fallen Winer.

Thomas Pock halved the deficit at the 16:39 mark of the first on a laser from just inside the blueline, but RPI brought its lead back to two at 5:53 of the second, as Danny Eberly's shot from the point caromed off Winer's pad and into the net.

Nick Kuiper made the score 3-2 just over a minute later with a low shot from the slot.

UMass badly outshot the Engineers throughout the contest, as it registered 41 shots on net to RPI's 12 attempts. The Maroon and White's shot output was higher than any of its totals from the 2001-02 season, while the 12 shots allowed was the fewest ever against a Division I opponent.

"You're not going to get a shot on net unless you shoot the puck," Fridgen said. "I think that hopefully our team is realizing that you got to do a better job of getting the puck to the net."

The Minutemen played the game with only five defensemen, as Craig MacDonald was inserted into the lineup as an extra forward. Cahoon said the decision had more to do with what he had seen in practice from his forwards rather than trying to generate more offensive opportunities. His judgment proved to be benefictial, as MacDonald was inserted on the second line after sophomore Greg Mauldin went down to injury.

"It worked out for us, because when Greg got dinged up, we still had four lines," Cahoon said.

Day's reaction to the news that he was going to make his debut with a 7-7 tie in the biggest game of the season was understandable.

"You get nervous all of a sudden," Day said. "[Coach Whipple] told me before to be ready, but you never think it's going to happen. You never want to think about a player like left going down. When [Coach] told me to get ready, I was really nervous. But everybody was behind me, especially [Krohn]."

Krohn was so woozy after the hit that he didn't even realize that his team scored on the very next play, but No. 7 looked much better in the second half, which saw him as the team's biggest cheerleader.

On the first play of his collegiate career, Day bootlegged left for 15 yards. He handed the ball to Cobbs on the next play, who dashed left for 10. Then Day, a native of Manchester, N.H., rolled right and hit senior receiver Adrian Zullo for a 12-yard gain.

"It created problems for us because all week we had our defensive package set up to stop Krohn and all of a sudden you get a feisty little sprint-out quarterback who runs around and runs the bootleg and things like that," Villanova Head Coach Andy Talley said. "We had to make a lot of adjustments at half-time to try to come up with some things in anticipation of things he might do. It's kind of like a Catch-22."

The drive essentially ended after the Zullo reception, as a holding penalty and a sack pushed the Maroon and White offense back and forced a punt, but it gave Day some needed confidence.

No. 16's numbers on the day (3-for-8, 27 yards, six rushes, 17 yards) aren't jaw-dropping, and his forth quarter interception when the Minutemen needed to simply run the clock out was the stuff that heart attacks are made from, but he didn't hurt the team and allowed the defense and special teams to win the game.

Day, who came to the Minutemen as one of the best high school quarterbacks in New Hampshire last year, has done a lot of growing up since arriving in Amherst. Especially after witnessing the atmosphere in Raleigh in September.

"I can remember sitting next to Timmy when North Carolina State ran out of the tunnel," Whipple said. "I just said, 'this isn't the New Hampshire state championship anymore, is it?'"

Day may not have been able to replace Krohn's stats, but he did do something the team has been able to do four times this season, get a 'W.' And he appreciated the difference in being a part in celebrating a win that he had taken part in.

"When you're on the sidelines, you're a part of a team and you're celebrating, but it's different when you're playing," Day said. "It's a little bit more meaningful when you get a victory that way."

stayed in bounds to score the touchdown and trim the deficit to 17-16.

"That's a "Sportscenter" highlight and that's A-10 football," Whipple said. "He made a great play."

But the snap for the extra point was low, the hold was not perfect, and Adam Iames' extra point attempt glanced off the left upright to preserve the UMass lead.

"Obviously you walk away feeling pretty good about your defense and pretty bad about your offense," Villanova Head Coach Andy Talley said. "We did not execute our offense today, turning the ball over. All you can ask your football team is to give you a chance to win the game at the end or go to an overtime at the end in this league. We had that chance and we didn't pull it out."

"It was just a great game," Whipple said. "Both teams played really hard and both teams made a bunch of plays. Our guys just had to hang in there. Timmy Day did a really super job, and our defense knew we were going to have to play unbelievable, and they did, they stepped up big."

Day was filling in for junior Jeff Krohn, who appeared to suffer a concussion in the first quarter, when he rolled out and scrambled, but instead of going out of bounds or sliding, went headfirst into the Wildcat linebacking corps. Day went three-for-eight for 27 yards and rushed for 17 more on a day where any pass that traveled more than 10 yards north-south was likely to be shifted by a great margin.

The key to the game for the Minutemen was the defense, who allowed Nova just 54 yards rushing on 33 carries. While Brett Gordon, arguably the A-10's best quarterback, threw for 209 yards on 31-of-43 passing, the Maroon and White shut down the flat passing attack with quick reactions and strong open field tackles.

"The thing I liked about our guys is there was no look in their eyes like they weren't going to win the game," Whipple said. "They had the confidence that we were going to win."

Both UMass touchdowns were set up by key interceptions. One came in the first by linebacker Mike Ziccardi, which gave the Minutemen the ball at the Villanova six. The other occurred in the third by sophomore DB Steve Costello, who killed two birds with one stone by thwarting a solid Wildcat drive, picking the ball off at the visitors' 27 and returning it 47 yards to put the Maroon and White in scoring position. Costello also blocked a punt in the first quarter.

"We got two huge plays on defense by Mike Ziccardi and Steve Costello," Whipple said. "We wanted to get Steve Costello in because we felt that he was a guy who was making plays in the little time that he was playing."

The win, which came in front of more than 11,000 fans, was obviously another step for the Minutemen, who have beaten top five teams in each of the past two weeks and now are in a position to control their own destiny for the A-10 title.

"The great thing was the effort and the atmosphere," Whipple said. "I think the people in the stands really helped us. Our kids just got better as the game went on. Outside the playoffs, this is as good as we've had. With the home win and the atmosphere this was as good as any.

"These kind of wins are what you can build a year on and build a program on," he continued. "We've got a long way to go, but this was a solid step, as solid a step as we've taken all year."

His players agreed.

"I've got a feeling that this win is going to lead to a lot of good things down the road and in the playoffs," Day said.

"We believe we're a very good team," McKenzie said. "We have to come out and play UMass football and we decide whether we're going to win or lose."

But perhaps more was responsible for this victory than just hard work and good plays.

"I think the magic of McGuirk again helped us," Whipple said.

Deren etches name into record books

By Mike Marzelli
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts men's soccer team is just that, a team. They are a close-knit unit that thrives on team success and group accolades. Because of that they are the defending Atlantic 10 champions and entered Sunday's game against St. Bonaventure undefeated and seated atop the A-10 standings.

With a competitive St. Bonaventure club arriving in town, the Maroon and White hoped to parlay its team approach into remaining unbeaten in the league. With a 7-1 win, the Minutemen did just that. However a scary thing, so to speak, happened on the way: an individual stole the spotlight.

With three goals and three assists on the weekend, senior tri-Captain Jeff Deren became Massachusetts' all-time leading goal and point scorer, besting the previous marks of 96 points and 40 goals set by Mike Butler and Randy Iacobs, respectively. With 98 points and counting, Deren is excited and glad to finally call the record his own.

"It was exhilarating," said Deren. "The goals just kept coming and coming for me and when that one hit the back of the net, it was like a relief that it was finally over with."

Deren, the reigning Atlantic 10 Player of the Year, wasted little time in tying the school record on Sunday as he opened the scoring against the Bonnies 4:40 into the first half. Classmate Yuri Morales took a feed from junior Ptah Myers and slid a pass across the box to Deren, who beat the keeper to his open right side. After Myers hooked up with Morales for a goal of his own at 27:14, the stage was set for Deren to etch his name in the UMass record books.

Senior Andrew Fichter's long lead pass would find Myers in stride, and the junior slid a pass past the last St. Bonaventure defender to Deren, who preceded to beat the keeper one-on-one to his left at 47:53, and assert himself as the greatest goal-scorer to ever don the maroon and white.

"Its hard to explain what a feeling it was because you don't understand what you've done until you have time to think about it," said Deren. "I'm just happy to play soccer, it's a game that I love and everything just seemed to fall into place for me here."

Jeff Deren's day, however, was not over at Rudd Field as the newly crowned career-scoring champ would add to his legacy. In finding Myers with a quick pass across the box for a score at 54:57, Deren added the career points record to his resume.

"Both records are equally exciting. I was just glad I could do it at home in front of my friends and family, because they've been supporting me the whole time I've played soccer."

In having watched each of Deren's 41 career goals, Head Coach Sam Koch knows what his tri-captain means to his team both in terms of offensive output and the overall impact he has on his teammates.

"Any time you have a pure goal scorer on your team it just takes a lot of pressure off," said Koch. "It means a lot. To score as many goals as he has certainly helps us out a lot. He's just a great all-around player and to get the record is great for him.

"We have a lot of other guys on this team who are dangerous as scorers themselves. You can't just stop him and stop our team, and because he's so good it's really helped others get more space. He knows how to find the open man when he's marked tight, and because of that he's been dishing off some great assists."

The Minutemen are currently at 1 overall as they continue to rebound atop the A-10 at 3-0-1. Deren hopes to add to his 98 points as he embarks to lead UMass in defense of its conference title.

Against SBU Sunday, senior Jeff Deren moved atop the record chart for most goals and points in UMass history.

Saving the Day

Special teams ace Ben Albert (right) jumps into the arms of runner Jeff Smith after Anton McKenzie blocked a 38-yard field goal attempt by Adam James to preserve UMass' 17-16 victory over Villanova as the rest of the team celebrates their second consecutive win over an opponent ranked in the top five nationally.

Krohn injured; reserve gets his Day in the sun

By Jim Pignatiello

When a player is down on the field with an injury, the rest of his team doesn't usually pay too much attention. The captains and coaches will gather the players together and keep the team focused on the upcoming play.

That wasn't the case on the Massachusetts football team's first scoring drive in Saturday's 17-16 win over Villanova at Warren P. McGuirk Alumni Stadium as the majority of the team looked toward the Villanova two-yard line. They stared not because of the severity of the injury, but due to the number on the injured player's jersey: seven.

Quarterback Jeff Krohn was sprawled out on his back after a nasty collision just two yards shy of paydirt. After a Mike Zicardi interception that gave UMass possession at the Wildcats' seven-yard line, Krohn rolled right, tucked the ball and went for the end zone. When three Villanova defenders cut the Arizona State transfer at the goalline, everyone in the stands expected him to slide, protecting himself from the big hit.

Krohn went in headfirst.

The Nova defenders smacked

Jeff Krohn had to remain on the sidelines after a first-quarter injury.

Krohn helmet-to-helmet, causing a loud crack to echo into the stands and one of the few players UMass Head Coach Mark Whipple named as irreplaceable during the preseason was now laying on the ground, with the entire medical staff around him.

As soon as Krohn stood up, with the help of the staff, it was clear that one of the conference's best quarterbacks was essentially out on his feet and likely done for the game.

Whipple sent redshirt freshman Scott Ratliff in to finish the drive, which running back R.J. Cobbs capped with a touchdown run on the very next play, and for the next possession, which resulted in a pair of incomplete passes. Ratliff had seen mop up duty in five games this season, but once it was announced to Whipple that Krohn wasn't going to return, as evidenced by the medical staff's taking his helmet away from him, the Brown alum decided to go with true freshman Tim Day under center for the rest of the contest.

"I thought Scott did a really good job," Whipple said, "but I felt like we weren't going to throw the ball a whole lot and [Day] could get outside and make some people miss."

But backup Tim Day came on to lead UMass to come-point triumph.

McKenzie's block bails out QB

By Matt Brady
Collegian Staff

Over its first six games, the Massachusetts football team showed the college football world that it possessed a solid and methodical running game, a consistent and sometimes fantastic passing attack and a strong defense that was up to any challenge.

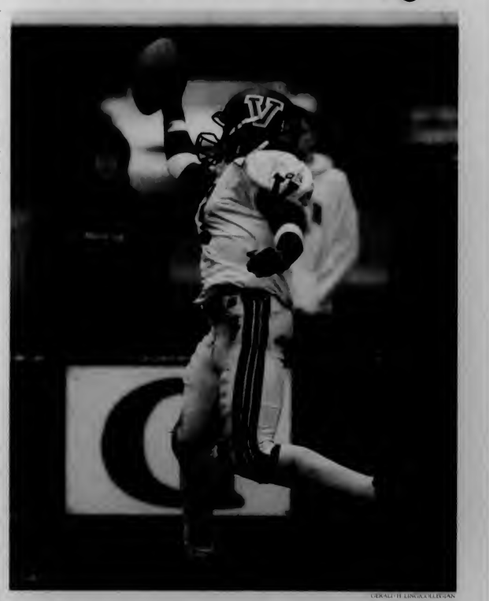
What it showed the world on Saturday was that it also has a flare for the dramatic.

Anton McKenzie blocked a potential game-winning 38-yard field goal with 43 seconds remaining to hold off the fourth-ranked Villanova Wildcats (6-2, 3-2 Atlantic 10) in one of the best games in McGuirk Alumni Stadium's history.

UMass	17
Villanova	16

"I knew they didn't expect me to go, so I told [Massachusetts] Coach [Mark Whipple] to let me go. Luniarr [Monterrio] was outside of me, and kept the wing wide," McKenzie said. "[Jeremy] Cain kept the end inside, so I just had the gap in the middle and had to make the play."

"It was a great call at the right time. I hadn't gone the whole game on an extra point or field goal block."



The field goal block was an enormous relief for the Minutemen (5-2, 3-1 A-10) after backup quarterback Tim Day shocked everyone by throwing an interception on 2nd and 10 with less than two minutes to go, giving the Wildcats the ball at the 28 yard line.

"[Anton] saved me big time," Day said. "I made a mistake and these guys picked me up. All the older guys told me they would pick me up and were behind me. I'm not going to make any excuses, it was a stupid decision, and I apologize for giving anybody a heart attack."

The interception shocked even Coach Whipple, who called an entirely different play.

"At the end I called the play and I said, 'You're running the ball,' and he nodded his head at me," Whipple said. "When he let go of the ball, that's the most shocked I've ever been in my career of coaching.

On the previous drive, Villanova moved the ball methodically downfield, throwing mostly short passes and running the ball to combat the south-north wind which was gusting throughout the game in upwards of 30 mph. After the Minuteman defense forced the Wildcats into fourth and goal from the 13 yard line, Nova quarterback Brett Gordon threw a high ball to top receiver Brian White, who made a one-handed circus catch and

Brian White's highlight reel catch in the fourth quarter nearly spelled doom for the Minutemen, but UMass nation breathed a sigh of relief when the point after touchdown bounced off the left upright.

Boston Globe editor to visit UMass today

By Dan Lamothe
Collegian Staff

Boston Globe Editor Martin Baron visits the University of Massachusetts today, with lectures in a Media Criticism class in Hasbrouck Hall 126 at 1 p.m. and at Memorial Hall at 4:30 p.m.

Baron will address the Boston Globe's coverage of child abuse and its cover-up in the Catholic Church.

"It's a good time to hear from the editor of the Globe," journalism professor and Globe columnist B.J. Roche said. "The series of stories puts them in contention for a Pulitzer."

Baron joined The Globe in July. At the time, the Globe's investigative Spotlight Team was working around a court order that had been proposed by the Archbishop of Boston attorneys. The attorneys had proposed that a multi-million dollar lawsuit filed against the Church be kept under wraps. Superior Court Judge James McHugh then ordered all documents involving the Church to be sealed. He cited fairness to the Catholic Church as his reason.

Less than a month after taking over at The Globe, Baron had Globe attorneys drafting a motion to rescind McHugh's court order to make the court documents available to the public. In November, Superior Court Justice Constance M. Sweeney granted the motion. A court of appeals upheld the decision in December.

The information that came from those documents led to the two-part Spotlight Team series in January that exposed that over 130 children alleged that Father John J. Geoghan had acted in various inappropriate ways sexually around them. The documents and the articles that The Globe ran on them outlined accusations against more than 80 other priests in the diocese and the alleged cover-ups that followed.

According to UMass Journalism Department Chair Norman Sims, Baron comes to the Amherst campus upon an invitation that Roche extended to him in the spring. "She invited him and he accepted," Sims said. "I don't know that he's ever been to UMass. It's a great opportunity for him to get to know the campus. We thought it would be a good idea to bring him and let him become more familiar with the place."

Sims said that the Journalism Department has a task force that looks to see who they can bring to campus. "We do our best to contribute to the intellectual life of campus," Sims said.

"People on campus sometimes criticize the Globe's coverage of the University," Sims said. "You have to remember that the Catholic Church criticized The Globe for a lack of coverage. The Globe is now covering the Catholic Church and may win a Pulitzer Prize for its efforts."

The department emphasized the importance of the stories The Globe coveted. "I know it had an impact on kids I grew up with," Roche, a native of Marblehead, Mass., said. "This story has probably affected a good number of people on campus."

Baron will spend the majority of the day on campus grounds. He will meet members of the Journalism Department for lunch at the Faculty Club before speaking in Steve Simurda's Media Criticism class. After the formal 4:30 lecture, Chancellor John V. Lombardi and Lee Edwards, Dean of the College of Humanities and Fine Arts, will have dinner with Baron.

Baron's journalism career can be traced through many of America's great newspapers. The Tampa Tribune hired him as a state desk reporter in 1976. From there he moved up the ladder into various roles at The Los Angeles Times, The Miami Herald, and The New York Times.

Before being named editor of The Globe, Baron was the executive editor at The Miami Herald. The Herald won the Pulitzer Prize in 2001 under his leadership for breaking news coverage on the Elian Gonzalez ordeal.

Iraqi prisons emptied

Government releases convicts in 'gesture of gratitude'

Iraqis storm the Abu Ghraib jail 35 kilometers (21 miles) northwest of Baghdad following the announcement by Saddam Hussein that most prisoners were going to be freed. The government called the amnesty, which includes political prisoners, a way of thanking the nation for re-electing President Saddam Hussein last week in a referendum.

By Sameer N. Yacoub
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq (AP) – Joyful shouts and music rang out as Iraqi convicts poured from prisons, released in what their government portrayed as a gesture of gratitude.

Iraqi officials did not say how many prisoners were covered, and it was not possible to confirm how many walked free. Reporters saw hundreds leaving prisons, and international human rights groups have said Iraq held tens of thousands of political prisoners alone.

U.S. officials dismissed Sunday's amnesty as a ploy by a desperate President Saddam Hussein to rally domestic and international support. The scenes played out all day and into the night were as spontaneous a public display backing Saddam as Iraq has ever seen.

Freed prisoners carrying their belongings in plastic shopping bag chanted: "We sacrifice our blood and souls for Saddam!"

"We are ready to defend our leader and country with our blood," said Ali Karim Hassan, who walked out of Abu Ghareb prison, about 10 miles south of Baghdad, after serving seven years of a 10-year sentence for stealing a welding machine.

"Today, we are given a great chance to start a new life and I will try my best to avoid jail," he added.

The government called the amnesty a way of thanking the nation for supporting Saddam, who claimed 100 percent of Iraqis voted for him in a presidential referendum last week. His decree, read repeatedly on national television Sunday, said the "full and complete and final amnesty" applied to "anyone imprisoned or arrested for political or any other reason."

In another broadcast Sunday, Justice Minister Munthir al-Shawi described the amnesty as "the leader's bounty bestowed on those who walked in the path of sin and wrongdoing in order to give them the chance to return to the nation's folds."

Al-Shawi said the amnesty will not cover those who spied "for the Zionist entity," referring to Israel, and the United States.

State-run television said other Arabs imprisoned or detained in Iraq were included in the amnesty, but Iraqi officials did not say whether that included Kuwaiti prisoners of the 1991 Gulf War. Kuwait accuses Iraq of failing to account for more than 600 Kuwaitis and nationals of other countries who disappeared during the Gulf crisis. Baghdad insists it has released all war prisoners and in recent years, started accusing Kuwait of not cooperating to determine the fate of 1,150 Iraqis who went missing during the crisis.

The International Committee of the Red Cross, which has been involved in the Iraqi-Kuwaiti prisoner impasse, said Monday it had no information on whether Kuwaiti Gulf War prisoners were included.

Saddam has made a number of attempts to rally public support recently. Under regulations announced several weeks ago, plots of land have been given to loyalists in the army, government and the ruling party. A mortgage bank, which closed down years ago, was reopened to provide interest-free loans to selected officials. Cars were sold at discount prices.

After hearing the amnesty news on state-run television, prisoners' families rushed to Abu Ghareb to find inmates pouring from their cells, chanting pro-Saddam and anti-U.S. slogans.

Police say sniper may have contacted them

By Stephen Manning
Associated Press

ROCKVILLE, Md. (AP) – In a tantalizing turn in the hunt for the Washington-area sniper, investigators said Monday the killer apparently tried to contact them in a phone call that was too garbled to understand. They pleaded with the person to call back.

The announcement came hours after Virginia authorities surrounded a white van in Richmond, Va., and seized two men. Police later said the men had nothing to do with the case and would be deported for immigration violations.

The most intriguing development came from Montgomery County Police Chief Charles Moose, who is in charge of the investigation.

Moose disclosed for the first time that a call had been received from someone of high interest to investigators – but the call was muddled.

"The person you called could not hear everything you said. The audio was unclear and we want to get it right. Call us back so that we can clearly understand," Moose said.

He did not disclose who received the call, when it was made or other details.

But investigators believe the call may have come from the sniper and Witnesses said a man was taken into custody from inside the van.

A weeklong set of workshops and sessions at the University of Massachusetts facilitated by speaker, storyteller and performer Reanae McNeal came to a culmination last Thursday with a performance of her one-woman show, Don't Speak My Mother's Name in Vain, at Mahar Auditorium.

Don't Speak My Mother's Name in Vain is an original play written and performed by McNeal that explores the historical and contemporary issues of African American women.

"An experience beyond words," is how LaWanza Lett-Brewington, director of community education at the UMass Everywoman Center, introduced the show. She took a moment to pass around a survey to the primarily female audience to find out what other kind of similar programs they were interested in attending and thanked the co-sponsors of the event.

"This is the first time all these groups came together to produce one project," Lett-Brewington said referring to the co-sponsors which included groups such as the Bilingual Collegiate Program, Office of ALANA Affairs, Graduate Women's Network, Black Student Union, Women of Color Leadership Network, CCEBMS, Black Mass Communication Project and ALANA Health Outreach and Education Program of University Health Services.

Lett-Brewington went on to give some background information on the performer. She described Reanae McNeal as an international performing artist, inspirational speaker, acclaimed vocalist and an oral "herstorian." McNeal is a published poet and an award winning playwright whose work has taken her to places such as Barbados, Italy and Hungary where she has taught and shown African-American storytelling, workshops, singing and praise dance.

She is also the recipient of community awards that include the Afro-Heart Award, Women of A Stolen Legacy Award and NAACP Appreciation Award. "She is phenomenal in every sense of the word in Maya Angelou's poem, Phenoinenal Woman," said Lett-Brewington as she brought the poet out.

Before going forward with her show, McNeal gave her own introduction where she spoke about herself and the eight characters that she was going to portray. She said the first four were the summation of the many stories that her grandmothers told her and were set at different times in history.

The other four characters, the last of which is herself, were contemporary women that display the modern day hardships African-American women faced.

With her socked feet and dreadlocked hair, McNeal encouraged audience participation in singing and dancing along, telling them that she wanted to be able to make them laugh and cry.

The first four characters, as she later explained in her question and answer session at the end of the show, were arranged chronologically.

"I wanted to put it in the order of herstory" described McNeal. The first was an eight-year-old slave girl sold and raped by a plantation owner. The others included a maid from the Reconstruction Era, a church-going lady during Marcus Garvey's "Back to Africa" movement, and an old woman reminiscing about Dr. Martin Luther King Jr.'s Civil Rights movement.

The second set of characters was modern-day women with different issues. They included a crack-head mother who "pimped" her daughter to support her habit, a lesbian dealing with homophobia within her community, and an eight-year-old child enduring racism at school and a molesting father at home. "Let the healing begin," were the last words of the performance.

McNeal made the correlation between the eight women explaining how she wanted to "break the silence" about tough issues that surround us but people find hard to talk about. "I feel like if we don't understand herstory, we can't really understand modern day dynamics," explained McNeal.

When asked by an audience member if she ever gets sick of performing the play, McNeal said that she has performed it countless times over the past seven years and she does not tire of it because "it is a testimony of my own personal healing and you all got to see me do therapy on stage."

In parting, McNeal advised the audience, "Always remember who you are. Activate your character by saying who you are."

She also urged the people in the audience to pursue their divine purpose in life.

Retired Worcester priest indicted

Desilets allegedly abused 18 altar boys over six-year period

Cardinal Bernard Law speaks at a news conference at his residence in Boston Friday. While the Worcester effect at the time was suspended when Desilets left Diocese faces its own problems, Law said that the the state in 1984 and moved to Canada.
Vatican's rejection of the U.S. bishops' policy against priest sex abuse would not delay the Boston archdiocese's reforms.

BOSTON (AP) – A retired priest indicted in Worcester Superior Court for 32 counts of indecent assault and battery has been arrested in Canada, following an international extradition request made by the Worcester District Attorney's office in August.

The Rev. Paul Desilets was arrested in Joliette, Quebec, and is scheduled to be arraigned Tuesday, according to a statement issued by Worcester District Attorney John J. Conte.

Canadian law enforcement officials could not immediately confirm the arrest.

According to the indictments, Desilets, 78, allegedly abused 18 former altar boys between 1978 and 1984. A 10-year statute of limitations in his residence in Boston Friday. While the Worcester effect at the time was suspended when Desilets left

He was a parish priest assigned to Our Lady of Assumption Parish in Bellingham from 1974 to 1984.

According to personnel documents released by the Archdiocese of Boston in June, Desilets once told an altar boy he would "burn in hell" if he reported their contact.

The extradition process should not be too complicated because of a Canadian extradition treaty with the United States, Lawyers Weekly USA editor Paul Martinek said.

After Desilets' arraignment in Canadian federal court, Massachusetts will have to ask the U.S. Justice Department to request Canada's Justice Department for extradition, Martinek said. The Canadian federal judge will decide if, when and how to complete the extradition, which has to be finally approved by the Canadian Justice Minister.

Jeffrey Newman, attorney for the alleged victims, said his clients would be extremely relieved to hear that Desilets could be extradited.

"They've waited a long time, he was indicted this summer," Newman said. "Obviously the district attorney has taken this very seriously, because it's complex to go through the treaties between countries. It would have been easy to let it lie low, but they didn't do that."

UMass secures money for telescope

By Bridget Henry
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts has been allocated $10 million for construction of the Large Millimeter Telescope in the Defense Appropriations Bill.

The full $10 million was incorporated in the House bill, but the Senate proposal included only $3 million. The funding becomes available as soon as President George W. Bush signs the final bill into law.

"The Large Millimeter Telescope (LMT) project will be capable of vastly extending our knowledge of the universe," Area Congressman John Olver said recently.

"The $10 million earmark I have secured in the final Defense Appropriations bill represents the full federal portion of funding for the project," Olver said. "I commend the UMass researchers who have been working on the innovative, international project, and I'm pleased that we were able to secure such a large amount of federal funding for the project."

Olver played an influential role in securing the funding in the final version of the bill.

"We're extremely grateful for the leadership of John Olver in harnessing the legislative support necessary to secure the funding for this important project," Chancellor John V. Lombardi said. "We also want to acknowledge Senator Judd Gregg of New Hampshire, for their key support of this project. The ability to deliver on the science and the support for this extraordinary scientific collaboration is a tribute to all who have been involved in the project to date."

The $90 million LMT project is a cooperative effort between UMass Amherst and Mexico's National Institute of Astronomy, Optics and Electronics. Construction of the LMT is currently underway on the peak of Cerro La Negra, a mountain in central Mexico some 150 miles east of Mexico City. Funding for the project comes from the U.S. and Mexican governments, the state of Massachusetts, and the Massachusetts and Mexican Universities.

When completed in 2004, the LMT will be the world's largest, most sensitive radio telescope. The LMT will enable researchers to be able to better study the origin of galaxies, stars, planets, and life itself.

"This telescope will dramatically improve our understanding of the birth of stars, as well as shed important light on the processes which occurred in the early universe," stated Fred Byron, interim Vice Chancellor for research at UMass Amherst. "This is the largest basic science collaboration in history between Mexico and the U.S., and it is hoped that many more such fruitful collaborations will occur in the future between the two countries."

that the caller was the same person who left a note and phone number Saturday night at the scene of the latest shooting, a law enforcement source told The Associated Press on condition of anonymity.

For the second consecutive day, Moose seemed intent on establishing a dialogue with the killer. On Sunday, he publicly pleaded with the note writer to call authorities.

On Monday, he said: "The message that needs to be delivered is that we are going to respond to a message that we have received. We are preparing our response at this time."

Moose said he could not discuss the message further.

The flurry of activity raised hope there had been a break in the search for the sniper who has killed nine people and critically wounded three others in Virginia, Maryland and Washington since Oct. 2.

The latest attack came Saturday night in a steakhouse parking lot in Ashland, just north of Richmond. The victim, a 37-year-old man, was felled by a single shot to the stomach.

He remained in critical but stable condition at a Richmond hospital Monday after having his spleen and parts of his pancreas and stomach removed. Surgeons removed the bullet from the victim, and ballistics test linked the slug to the sniper.

Surgeon Rao Ivatury said the man is conscious and responding to wife's voice, but will need additional surgery in the next few days.

"He still has a long way to go," Ivatury said.

Through the hospital, the wife issued a statement saying the caring and prayers she and her husband have received "have been a bright ray of hope and comfort."

Schools in Richmond and nearby counties were shut down Monday, and there was heightened interest after the two men were taken into custody in suburban Richmond.

served one out of three years for squandering public money described Saddam as "the best leader in the world."

"Now, I can breathe fresh oxygen again. It is like coming back from death," Amar al-Kurdi, who served one year out of 20 for breaking into houses, told The Associated Press at his home. After al-Kurdi arrived home late Sunday, his family distributed sweets to neighbors.

"I had not even dreamed of seeing my brother free so soon," said his sister, Amina al-Kurdi.

Iraq's Babil newspaper, owned by Saddam's son Odai, described the amnesty "as a lesson to Bush in true democracy."

President Bush has called for Saddam to be toppled, accusing him of stockpiling weapons of mass destruction and harboring terrorists, and has expressed concerns about Iraq's human rights record."

In Washington on Sunday, Secretary of State Colin Powell said the Iraqi amnesty was "typical" of Saddam's "use of human beings for these political purposes of his."

The newly freed prisoners "better watch out where the next door is that puts them right back in jail," Powell said on ABC's "This Week."

Also Sunday, after a meeting headed by Saddam, the Cabinet said U.N. weapons inspectors had failed to arrive last week as Iraq had hoped. The Cabinet blamed their absence on the United States.

Iraq had been pushing for an advance party to come to Baghdad, but chief U.N. weapons inspector Hans Blix said last week he would await a new U.N. Security Council resolution addressing charges Iraq is hiding weapons of mass destruction. Blix had said that since the council was still debating a resolution, the U.N. team wouldn't be able to deploy by Oct. 19.

The United States would like a tough resolution to strengthen the inspectors' mandate. France, though, opposes threatening language in any initial resolution, and negotiations at the United Nations have dragged on.

"The Security Council is discussing the (Iraq) issue and I hope that sometime this week or soon there will be a resolution of the Security Council," U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan said Monday after arriving in Dushanbe, Tajikistan as part of his first tour of Central Asia.

U.N. sanctions against Iraq, imposed after its invasion of Kuwait in 1990, cannot be lifted until inspectors verify Iraq is free of chemical and biological weapons and missiles to deliver them.

Supreme Court should revisit execution issue

The execution of death row inmates who killed before reaching the age of 18 may violate the eighth amendment, forbidding "cruel and unusual punishment" and is therefore constitutional.

This decision was silently supported by the U.S. Supreme Court yesterday when the nine justices rejected a case arguing the decision.

In 1989 the court heard the case Stanford v. Kentucky, ultimately deciding that the executions were legal. A 1988 decision from the high court made it illegal to execute convicted murderers who committed their acts before the age of 16.

Among the 38 states that have the death penalty in place, only 10 allow the execution of criminals who committed their acts before they reached voting age.

It is interesting that as a country the restrictions that keep voting, purchasing of tobacco and the ability to join the military at arm's length to "underage" persons, don't apply when that person is put on death row.

The Supreme Court recently ruled, in Atkins v. Virginia, that the execution of a mentally retarded inmate is unconstitutional. The reasons behind the 6-3 vote included that the execution of mentally retarded prisoners is unconstitutional because those inmates' brains are not fully-formed.

This has been proven of adolescents under the age of 18.

So does the logic apply to youth murderers? The not-fully-formed brain reasoning is what keeps voting out of the hands of 16 and 17-year-olds.

Non-scientific evidence of the last few years has revealed that adolescent brains are not fully developed, which often leads to erratic behaviors and thought processes in that age group," dissenting Justice John Paul Stevens said.

So, while the Supreme Court refused to hear the case, it was not all nine justices standing against the case. The four liberal justices, Stevens, David Souter, Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Stephen Breyer, dissented, saying that executions of younger criminals is a "relic of the past."

The "relic," said Stevens is inconsistent with the evolution of our society, and standards of decency.

Stevens also cited a "growing national consensus" opposing such executions. A similar national consensus was the basis of June's decision against the execution of mentally retarded inmates.

There seems to be a tie between the two cases, a national consensus.

If a large number of the citizenry are against executing youth criminals and mentally retarded criminals, and similar reasoning is being applied to both, then similar rulings should be considered.

Part of the problem with the court examining the Stanford case is that the case falls into legal restrictions that don't allow the court to review cases twice. Instead an appeal to the constitutionality of the death penalty was entered. This requires five supporting votes for the court to hear the case while reviewing a case requires four votes to review the issue.

The Supreme Court justices should look at the national consensus. When there are people being executed and the majority of executing states are against it, then the country as a whole should look at their policies.

Majority rules in the Supreme Court, the majority of people stand against these executions, the majority of states outlaw these executions, its time a majority of justices take the stand against it.

Decency in the bathrooms

MICHAEL DASILVA

Once again it is apparent that the males occupying room 000 on the institute of higher learning called Earth have their ability to successfully [illegible] a solid also be fully certified. If they something as simple as [illegible] properly use the restroom facilities again. The disgusting, filthy reality that the majority of the bathrooms on campus are continually in a state of [illegible] rights on the UMass campus. This is in no part due to the custodians, who are their job very well. I absolutely appreciate, with them. No matter how much they clean, [illegible] the bathrooms, [illegible] of their hard [illegible] choose to ignorantly [illegible] poor.

I don't know what the ladies' restroom in [illegible] look like at what college they attend, but I can testify for the men's room, because I use them. It seems that almost daily I will witness a guy urinating on the toilet next to me. I'll look at these people like they are from Mars. I mean, what is going on in their heads? It's very easy and simple, its right in front of the bathroom and urine. Yeah, I'm the one??? 2. Dash the [illegible] Please, go. Hopefully, there is only a step or two in there after. Wash your hands when I won't push it when some guy runs out. I can tell them that can't even make it past step one.

As for the thinking? "Gee, I've just gone to the bathroom. Well, look like I'm all done here." Or maybe they are saying to themselves, "I've just gone to the bathroom. What comes next? What do I do now? Oh well, can't figure this one out so I'll just leave." Or do they purposely, consciously, and cold-heartedly [illegible] to make this decision to not flush the toilet day after day? How lazy can one get? A five-year-old child could function more efficiently than some of the UMass college students using the restrooms up here.

It seems hard to believe that simple tasks such as not missing the toilet, and flushing would be two easily achievable goals for college students. I mean, it boggles my mind that they cannot do these simple things. Let me rephrase that, they can and choose not to. Maybe its laziness...or maybe its rudeness. Perhaps it's a combination of both. And on the weekends, it's definitely attributed to abuses of alcohol and other drugs.

Walking into a men's restroom on the weekends is like entering The Twilight Zone. One is bound to find anything. It's an absolute pig-sty. Be careful not to step on regurgitated foods, flooding alcohol, and other unidentified objects that are probably better left remaining "unidentified." Of course there are other things that I'm not even going to mention here that can be found in the bathrooms on the weekends, I mean everyone once in a while its funny. It's what college is supposed to be about, right? Just like the movie "Animal House." But when it happens every single day, even when people are sober. It's just sad and pathetic. Unfortunately, what these students fail to realize, is that they are perpetuating a problem whose consequence they will have to deal with. Their vision is very nearsighted because guess who has to use that same restroom next time they have to go to the bathroom? Them!

To the people who continually contribute to the filthy state that the bathrooms at UMass are in — missing the toilet not flushing, leaving a mess...these are all things that create problems and that just make everyone's day a lot more frustrating than it has to be. People have enough worries in day-to-day life without having to be stressed out when using the restrooms. It's just simply not cool. This type of behavior is not funny, and it needs to be stopped. It's rude and it's disgusting. It's extremely inconsiderate of the other people using the restrooms and the people cleaning the restrooms. How would you like it if you had to clean the bathrooms? Put yourself in those shoes. And, if you take a second to think about it, you're making it an awful place for yourself, to go to the bathroom. It defies any logic or rationale. A word to the wise. Let's grow up and start acting with some dignity and self-respect. If that's too much for you, at least don't forget to flush!

Feelin' random? I know I am

JACQUET

Every other week on about Thursday afternoon, I face a puzzling decision: "Alright, Sean what are you gonna write about this week?" Seems simple enough, but there's not always enough I have to say about certain things to fill 75 lines. This week, faced with a similar quandary, I panicked, then asked myself

"What would Jesus do?"

"That's it," I exclaimed as though I'd been possessed by the divine. "Random column."

It's been awhile; hope you enjoy.

Recently freed from the shackles of under-21 hell, I've assimilated into the uptown scene. One thing I don't understand: What is it about the sausage guy? Granted, all the people stumbling drunkenly out of McMurphy's need something to eat, but how could anybody eat that shop? Yeah, that's just what I need after I've over-imbibed: a sweating log of greasy hog anus peddled by some dude wheeling around a cart up and down the street.

I need some help in my campaign to convince Major League Baseball to alter the scheduling of playoff games. I need protestors. Good ones. Maybe I could enlist some bona-fide hippies. No. That wouldn't work. The only sport they're going to get up for is ultimate Frisbee.

Riding the bus the other day, I noticed a man with his entire hand, up to his wrist, lodged in his nose. He dug in for a bit, removed his finger, and examined his nails for evidence of the blockage. Apparently, dissatisfied with what he found, he went in for a second excavation attempt. Now, I'm all for cleaning the pipes, but does that need to be done in public? I wanted to scream at this guy: "Hey, either get a tissue, or wait until you get home." What if he has to go to some meeting where he needs to shake somebody's hand? Is that person going to know this guy was searching for moon rocks a couple of minutes before?

Speaking of the lower crust of society, did you hear about this guy Beau Duran? He's the Phoenix disc jockey who called the widow of recently deceased St. Louis Cardinals pitcher Darryl Kile and asked if she had a date for Game 3 of the National League Divisional Series. The Cardinals, and Mrs. Kile were understandably outraged and the radio station promptly canned Duran, the comic genius. Hey, Beau, let's see how many dates you get now that you're unemployed. And what kind of name for a guy is Beau. Was Julian taken?

"Did you see them play? They looked like they were stoned all season."

The Diamondbacks lost that series getting swept by the Cardinals. The Yankees also looked like a bad IV team in their Division Series loss to the Angels. Frankly, I'm glad that neither of last year's World Series teams will be returning to the Fall Classic. I needed another Yankees World Series title like I need a rash on my crotch.

Despite the Yankees loss, not all is well on the home front. The Pats have lost three straight heading into their bye week. Chin up, sports fans. No matter how bad it gets, remember one thing: we're not the Bengals.

We're also not the New York Mets. I don't know why it's such a surprise that some of the Mets players were smoking weed. Did you see them play? They looked like they were stoned all season. You just know Mike Piazza has a huge three-foot bong in his apartment. And he only smokes the sweetest pot grown in some exotic South American country. He probably has Johnny Depp fly it in on a plane like in Blow.

No, seriously, you can't play baseball stoned. I mean it's not like going to class or driving a car.

The D.C. sniper apparently left the cops a tarot death card saying he was God. That makes sense. I always pictured God as a gun-toting, maniac sniper.

I wonder what Miss Cleo thinks of the sniper and his tarot cards. The cards don't lie, man (said in a Miss Cleo voice).

Congress recently gave President Bush the green light to attack Iraq if necessary. In all his public appearances he's coolly said Iraq may pose a threat to national security, and may have a stockpile of nuclear weapons. Oh, good. What a relief. For a second I thought this war was just about oil.

What is it about moustaches and crazy, evil dictators? Sadaam Hussein, Adolf Hitler, Fidel Castro, Walt Disney, all had moustaches. Is facial hair a prerequisite for evil? I bet if Sadaam would shave, he wouldn't be half as crazy.

I don't understand the Army's new advertising campaign. If you were trying to attract people to join the Army, why would you use a Godsmack song? Wouldn't you at least want to choose a decent rip-off of Nine Inch Nails?

Pressure from the University's administration forced umassdrunks.com to shut down this year. That's cool, though. At some point, we need our creativity and originality stomped on so we can learn how to stifle the creativity and originality of our own children.

We should thank UMass for making this campus as vanilla as possible. They're teaching us how to be bland, and unable to think for ourselves. Not only that, but all the budget cuts have taught us how to be thrifty when money is tight. We've learned how to live without desks to sit in, adequate class space, and support programs for minority students. Because really, do we need any of these things?

Thanks for listening. And, hey, don't pick your nose in public.

COURTNEY CHARLES

"So, if you can get an ounce of weed for $300 and you can get an ounce of coke for $800, if you get the coke your opportunity cost is the ounce of weed that you give up," my neighbor said to me. He was trying to help me with economics, and he did. A lot. I think he's about one of the chillest guys I know. He's at least in the top ten anyhow.

The test was absolutely horrible.

It was very unfortunate. When you study for days, for a huge test and then it sucks, it makes you feel like a jackass.

I've had many a jackass moment. Like when I walk more than a mile home to my place during rush hour traffic and only then realize when I get home that my dress is see-through. Or when I go running, and stuff myself into three sports bras to tame the wild ones, and then realize they fell out after you see all your hot neighbors.

Yeah, then I feel like a jackass.

Speaking of my neighbors, two of them have pet snakes, Killer and Satan. Killer is this big boa constrictor-like snake, and he bit my roommate. He's never bitten anyone before. Ever.

My neighbors felt like jackasses. They couldn't stop apologizing.

Then Satan, the skinny little albino, slithered down my shirt. No one apologized for that.

One of them just said in his Colorado drawl, "He goes to the warmest place." So then I felt like a jackass because now they all had a reason to stare at my buss line.

Someone recently asked my hot sexy roommate if I had gone insane since he last saw me.

The answer's NO.

I was insane before, when I didn't live my life to the fullest. It took a lot to make me realize it, but when I did, I decided to be myself, which, I'll admit, is definitely crazy.

I'm all about living it up, testing the limits. I just want to do everything I can, since I'm not going to live forever.

So what if people think I'm crazy?

So what if sometimes I feel like a jackass?

I'm happy. I'm not going to be that quiet girl wearing a turtleneck, standing in the corner at a party. I'm going to be living it up in a wonder bra and a smile, dancing on a table.

I want my life to be my own. I want my mistakes and victories to be all my own. Whether I'm running and rolling around in my prostitute bathrobe, grabbing some stranger's ass, or making my roommates touch my boobies, at least I know my choices are all my own.

Because let's face it, who really does that sort of thing besides me.

So okay, yeah, maybe I am just a little crazy. But my friends are just as insane.

When you accept yourself for who and what you are, when you realize what's important to you and what you want out of your life you see just who your real friends are. Your real friends don't talk to your boobies. They tell you you're "remarkably beautiful" when you feel like s—t. They tell you, you can have any guy you want. They say they love you when you're all trashed.

Your friends keep you safe from everything out there that threatens to rip you apart. They keep you sane when you feel like rolling around naked in the mud or throwing bagels at people around campus.

No matter who you are, no matter what you believe or don't believe if you can be honest with yourself and love who you are, your friends will accept you for what you are.

DAVID POE
Iron Horse
Oct. 19

NORTHAMPTON – When one interviews musician David Poe, one notices a few things about him.

He's generous.

Looking to get away from the noise and bustle of the Iron Horse Music Hall as it prepares for the night's activities, we head out into town, finally resting our laurels in the front of the Vermont Country Deli, a bagels-and-coffee shop down the way from Pleasant Street. During our interview, a semi-homeless man looking for change for coffee interrupts us; David Poe runs in and buys the man a coffee. Seconds after the man leaves, a young man gets on his knees in supplication in front of our table in an overly melodramatic attempt to bum a cigarette. Poe, unhesitatingly, hands over a cigarette to the man. He buys our mutual companion, A.J. (a marketing rep for his label and a friend of mine), and me our first martinis, agrees to be in a photo with her and signs me an autograph.

He's funny.

During his brief, five-song set (opening for Kim Richey, who A.J. and I declined to see in favor of hanging with Poe in the green room), Poe entertains the audience by riffing on the length he has been allotted (he jokes that his second song is the encore), by ordering a beer while on stage and informing the audience on the German tradition of looking directly into a person's eyes while toasting with them; if you don't, then you are doomed to thirteen years of bad sex. (I'm not superstitious, but I will never break eye contact when I toast ever again.)

He's talented.

His set was brief, but showed a polished skill even without a backup band to help him. A particular highlight was his song "Blue Glass Fall," off his 1997 debut album (produced by T-Bone Burnett, of the O Brother, Where Art Thou? soundtrack fame.)

He's a vegetarian. ("I don't eat anything with charisma.")

He's smart. He's opinionated. And he has a lot of thoughts that he likes to express – sometimes to the horror and detriment of a lowly journalist trying to scribble as many of the original words as he can on a Steno pad. (I will invest in a mini-tape recorder, a little device that Poe has no troubles pimping for; I will abide by his advice now.) Though he repeatedly stops to apologize for what he thinks is a dear interview, I find what he's saying – about art, about politics, about radio – fascinating. It's nice to see an artist with an actual thought about an actual matter, rather than a publicist's idyll of a client (you know, the person who says the same, pre-digested claptrap at every interview.)

As we stroll from the Iron Horse on a cool (but not cold), cloudy day, we all engage in small talk. (A.J., being more talkative than I, is the one who's carrying the conversation with Poe more than I am.) He's been to Northampton before, but never got to really see the sights. He appreciates the small college towns, having been raised in Ann Arbor, Michigan and having attended college in Miami, Ohio (Miami, Ohio).

We decide to do the interview outside, at a tiny green metal table covered in sugar. Poe goes inside and grabs a tea; I let him get settled in, and we launch the interview.

Poe got signed in 1997 and pretty much has toured since then (the current leg of his tour ends Oct. 25.) To him, the "opening thing can be fun," but he prefers to tour on his own, when he can play with his own band (his band is made up of drummer Sim Cain; Mark Rebo, who worked with Elvis Costello, and John Abbey, who plays the upright bass; Brad Jones, who has worked with Matthew Sweet and Ron Sexsmith produced Poe's latest album, The Late Album.) For Poe, both the studio and the stage have their advantages. "I like both. The studio is great because you get to craft ostensibly definitive versions of the songs. Playing live is fantastic because you can completely nullify those versions."

Poe's biggest exposure came when his song "The Drifter" was heard on the hit teen soap opera "Dawson's Creek." That particular home for his music didn't exactly come from his own mind ("A guy in Hollywood talks to a guy in New York. '', and he doesn't always sound pleased with the placement. "It was funny....I got more response from this 'Dawson's Creek' thing than anything I have ever done. It's hilarious to me that the bevy of friends and quasi-friends who looked at me and said 'Dude, you're on Dawson's Creek!'" But the musician, who is "anti-bad art," cannot dismiss any "avenue that can get the music out." He paints a grim reality for those looking to break into the scene, about the homogenization of radio, MTV and VH1 – the kinds of corporate controlled palaces where five songs get pushed and anything else gets shunted aside.

He explains that the same standards of accountability that apply to big-businesses like Enron should be held for the big conglomerates that own the majority of the nation's radio stations (a kind of cultural accountability). I learned some interesting information from his ramblings. One: there are only 30 truly indie stations in the country. (A couple of the good ones include WXPN in Philadelphia and KINK in Portland.) But, quite reasonably I think, he also puts partial blame on the shoulders of the consumers who "bitch about the lack of cool stuff...but don't do anything," preferring stuff "delivered the easy and cheap way."

When I ask what he calls his music, Poe says that it is "Quality Control Music." Basically he makes music that "doesn't suck, and I make sure it doesn't suck." (His name being associated with it and all). He's not interested in making the stuff that has been manipulated by the corporate body. He doesn't want to be associated with things like CMJ (the College Music Journal, for the uninformed) saying, "Anyone who dictates [what kids listen too] is full of s—t. CMJ has done more to hurt music...we need magazines with superb writers who write about good music. It's sad that the people tracking music don't know how the structure works."

Many things are bought and paid for – the radio play lists, the Oscars, the current war on Iraq, according to Poe, and the war on Iraq, he says, is another example of "creating an enemy...it's all a perception game." It's no surprise why foreign countries hate us, he says, what with televisions showing things like "Dawson's Creek" when a kid is living in a tent with 20 other people and drinking dirty water. Poe had one great quote – "Art has a conscience." Art, whatever field it may be, has a responsibility to display the culture in a way that provides impact and not a mere ephemeral thrill. (My interpretation, not a reiteration of David Poe's words.)

Poe says aspiring musicians should just play and write, but anyone who gets into it to make money is mistaken (and, once again, he pimps for the mini-recorder.) To him, a "good song is like a picture taken of yourself by a stranger." He's always open to collaborations (he's worked with Duncan Sheik and Greg Johnson of the Jayhawks amongst others.) He listens to The Beatles (his favorite album of theirs: Revolver), Miles Davis, Trip Shakespeare and Morgan Taylor. He's not a fan of Pearl Jam or any of the sound-alike bands. He's excited about the growing concern and activism among college students about things such as the war on Iraq. Poe supports a more diplomatic use of power; such as the way JFK handled the Cuban Missile Crisis, rather than the trigger-happy abuse of power our junkie of a president is employing, as he puts it. He's "interested in stuff that's good and innovative and reflective." Not stuff that "apes the culture...that's meaningless...boring, rehashed stuff...there's so much bitchin' stuff, even in Northampton [Poe notes the band Hospital as a good band]... There's so much to love, you know, so why bother with music or books or films or politicians or wars that are full of lies."

After the show, A.J., Poe and I kicked back in the green room and had a couple beers. We talked, off the record about music, drugs, German beer, his tour and great filmmaking (We agreed that Wes Anderson is an awesome filmmaker.) And, as I sit here, finishing the typing this interview for publication, I reflect on wise words David Poe delivered: "I don't wanna be the general anesthesia of the culture. I wanna be the f——n' triple espresso...or at least the Scotch." Maybe none of us should be content to be anesthesia – we should all try to be a triple espresso.

New comic series on the last man on earth

By Erik Taylor
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Y: THE LAST MAN
Written by Brian K. Vaughan
Art by Pia Guerra and José Marzan Jr.
DC Comics

Imagine waking up one morning and realizing you were the last man on Earth. Amateur escape artist Yorick Brown awoke one morning and found a mysterious plague had wiped out anything with a Y chromosome, leaving the females to inherit the Earth. From a fantasy point of view, it might seem like a male paradise, but what about the repercussions? How would the world operate without men? How would governments function? Where would the blame begin when the human race begins to die out? Why is Yorick's male pet monkey, named Ampersand, still alive? With all of these questions and more, how is Yorick going to survive on his quest to find his missing fiancée Beth?

Author Brian K. Vaughan brings us on Yorick's journey in Y: The Last Man as he searches the broken and dangerous world for answers. Y's writer puts Yorick against world powers looking to repopulate their own countries, women looking to capture and sell him to the highest bidder and fanatics believing it was God's will to kill men and thus their responsibility to kill him. It is an epic quest as Yorick searches the Earth for his missing true love. Vaughan wants to give his readers a whole new definition of what it means to be a man.

The way Vaughan handles the politics, foreign and domestic, are interesting. Yorick's mother is a congresswoman and is in DC, trying to get a handle on the situation. Due to the chains of succession, the Secretary of Agriculture Margaret Valentine has become President of the United States. Once Yorick's existence as the last man on earth begins to leak, he will have entire governments using every means possible to secure Yorick for themselves.

So far, the first three issues of this 12 issue maxi-series has sold out. Vertigo, an adult subdivision of DC Comics, plans on reprinting the first three issues in a one-issue collection to draw in the curious reader. The first issue demonstrates the horror of the plague, showing the brutal deaths to all men all over the world. Thus far, Yorick has been able to get to his mother in Washington D.C., by stealing a garbage truck full of male corpses from an ex-supermodel looking to sell his body for cash. The Republican's wives have stormed the White House, looking to carry on their husband's work and reclaim power from the Democrats. Once the White House learns of Yorick's existence, they agree to help him find his fiancée Beth and a Bioengineer with some possible answers to the man-eliminating plague.

"It's rare to find a comic with such a universal appeal, and this book is going to be the next best thing," Ain't It Cool News recently reported.

Y: The Last Man #4 will be on sale Wednesday Oct. 23 at Showcase Comics in Hadley, where one can inquire about the three-issue collection due out soon.

No cartoons for Disney's latest romance

Tuck Everlasting makes great transition from printed novel to the silver screen

By Kathleen Nestor
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

TUCK EVERLASTING
Directed By Jay Russell
Starring Sissy Spacek, William Hurt and Alexis Bledel
Playing at Cinemark at the Hampshire Mall

Based on the popular book by Natalie Babbit, Tuck Everlasting is a sweet, not saccharine, fairytale romance that audiences of all ages will enjoy. At first glance, one would not think to classify this film as a typical Disney production, for the main focus centers around life and death. However, it seems as though Disney is finally taking a more adult-like approach to some of their recent movies. (Tarzan, Atlantis and The Kid), where subjects of a more serious nature such as death, loss and even child abuse are discussed. It's good to see that they've realized their role in society as fundamental influences on young minds and that a movie with the main dilemma centering solely on if Prince Charming will take them to the ball or not is not only dated, but completely unrealistic. Tuck is setting the standard for mature Disney fare, proving a movie can have mass appeal and still teach a lesson or two about life.

COURTESY BONTHRUSH

Jesse Tuck (Jonathan Jackson) touches the heart of Winnie Foster (Alexis Bledel), a 1914 teenager.

This period piece takes the audience back to 1914, where Winifred (Alexis Bledel) lives in a stuffy, aristocratic, Victorian household of proper etiquette and manners that seem to suffocate her even more than her tightly drawn corset. All Winnie longs for is to have the freedom to venture outside the gates of her house, make every day a new adventure and, above all, avoid attending Finishing School at all costs.

Enter cute boy, Jesse Tuck, played by Jonathan Jackson, who whisks Winnie away from her stifled existence and into a life of seclusion and isolation in the deep forest with the rest of the Tuck family. Winnie soon learns the secret of the Tuck family that has granted all of them with an immortal existence and quickly finds herself a midst a life-altering predicament of choosing between living an eternal life with her new love Jesse or living out the rest of her natural life. But don't be fooled by the simplistic premise of love, happiness and how great it is to live forever – beyond the surface, this film delves past a typical love story by addressing issues such as the fast approaching urbanization of America and the destruction of natural habitats, the importance of family, the loss of loved ones and even the interaction of the social hierarchies of the early 20th century.

To find the main attraction of Tuck Everlasting, one has to look past the obvious talents of the cast and screenplay writers and focus on the commonly overlooked aspects of most movies, the scenery and the musical score. Breathtaking views of vibrant mountaintops, cascading waterfalls and never ending fields serve as the backdrop to this period romance. Even the scenery reinforces the central theme of the natural progression of life, with its lush greenery and wildlife. The careful interplay between light and shadow in most scenes gave the film an split characterization. Going hand in hand with the style and mood of this nature-based movie was the original score. Best known for his work on Harry Potter, Forrest Gump and Father of the Bride, it is no surprise that composer William Ross entrances us with his emotional, sentimental and romantic orchestrations in Tuck Everlasting. This glowing, almost heavenly musical score makes the movie unforgettable and comparable only to the exquisite beauty of the hypnotic soundtrack to the Last of the Mohicans.

The Man in the Yellow Suit (Ben Kingsley) from the world of Winnie Foster (Alexis Bledel)

This is one of the best date movies I have seen in a very long time, with its timeless story, amazing scenery and lingering melodies.

What's even more amazing is that it managed to be an outstanding film without involving sex, cars, excessive violence or even death defying stunts – a rarity for movies as of late. A – Walt Disney Pictures; rated PG for some violence; 88 min.

X-country improves in Albany

By Reid Davenport
COLLEGIAN STAFF

This past Saturday, the Massachusetts men and women's cross country teams competed at the 36th annual Albany Invitational. It was obvious that there was great improvement on the young men's team as it came in fifth place out of 22 teams and the women pushed for an effort to place 11th out of 19.

In the men's division, Marist won the race with 82 points, followed by Colgate with 83, Lehigh with 94, host Albany with 94 and the Minutemen followed with 103 points. For the women, defending NCAA Division III national champion Middlebury College won with 18 points, followed by Albany with 103, Syracuse with 132, Lehigh with 134 and Northeastern with 162 to round out the top five. The Minutewomen turned in a total of 263 points to finish 11th.

"This was our first time in this meet," men's leader Dave Hantman said. "The field was very flat and fast. It took a toll on our calves, but all the guys have improved so much since the start. We really came together on this meet and pushed each other along."

The individual placing for the men's team included Dave Hantman (13th, 26:27.42), Andy McCarron (18th, 26:34.74), Colin Baughman (19th, 26:35.10), Ed Breen (25th, 26:53.92), Mike Ahearn (28th, 26:56.39), Josh Williams (38th, 27:09.84), Paul Noone (43rd, 27:19.22) and Sean Corbett (57th, 27:32.93).

Individual placing for the women's team included Julie McGee (31st, 19:34.52), Tricia Silva (42nd, 19:44.22), Kate Markopoulos (59th, 19:59.52), Alexis Anzelone (66th, 20:06.17) and Katie Knowles (72nd, 20:19.50).

The teams return to action Saturday, Nov. 2, at the 2002 Atlantic 10 Championships. The meet is set to run in Pittsburgh, Pa.

"We're definitely going to be ready for this meet," Hantman said. "The team is young, but we're all ready for the A-10s. Hopefully you will be able to see us within the top three teams."

Boston Globe editor lectures at UMass

By Dan Lamothe
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Boston Globe Editor Martin Baron made two public appearances yesterday at the University of Massachusetts, outlining the Globe's coverage of several major events and telling his audience, "the mission of a newspaper is to get at the truth."

Baron spent considerable time explaining the thought process behind uncovering the scandal in the archdiocese of Boston and the Catholic Church. "We knew that those stories would put us in a situation of competition with the Catholic Church," Baron said.

He said that "a rich vein of material" could be found showing that the scandal was important to public policy. "The point is we've never it's a majority of priests," Baron said. "What we said is that there were priests, and that when there were priests, the church did very little to investigate and react to it."

Baron said that a column run by Eileen McNamara in July 2001 caught his attention. The column said that documents exposing sexual abuses in the Catholic Church "would never see the light of day," because of a court order that kept them from becoming public information.

"Those stories got my attention," Baron said. "To me sex abuses like that on a national scale deserved national attention."

Baron said that he could not see why the media was setting for less than whole story because of a lack of access to the court documents. Within a day he was talking to Globe lawyers about drafting documents to challenge the court order. "It had never really come up before," he said.

"The Church argued [that] we had no right to ask for the document. It was a public policy issue," Baron said. "Whether the Church properly supervised priests...whether they had been negligent, or worse, in not removing priests."

He said that a longtime religion writer told him that The Globe ran 250 stories on the Catholic Church in the first hundred days of their coverage. The first article drawing on the court documents ran Jan. 7, 2002.

"We have no issues with exonerating priests who are falsely accused," Baron said of priests who have been named in false lawsuits. "We've done both."

Baron acknowledged comparisons between Watergate and the Church scandal. "It's an interesting comparison," he said.

He said that there are certain fundamental differences between the two cases, though. He cited the methodology in which the stories were gathered as a difference.

"Watergate had a lot of anonymous sources," Baron said. "They're different in character," he said.

Baron said that the stories are comparable in the "profound impact" that they have had on institutions.

The Globe editor also outlined the coverage in Boston of 9/11. "While it happened in New York, it was also very much our story," Baron said.

Baron said that he had been on the job for about six weeks when 9/11 broke, and that he was very much an outsider at the time. "Whether the emotions at work at the time were fear or whether they were insecurity, really doesn't much matter because both of those were wonderful motives," he said.

The Globe had to tackle matters of religion, public policy, national security, airport security, an economic crisis and military action in the next days. "Fortunately for The Globe, we had about a half a dozen people in New York at the time of the attacks," Baron said. "We started with a big advantage."

Baron recalled the scramble in the office that day. "I was one of only two people in the office at the time," he said.

The Globe offered their first special editions ever on Sept. 11. "We were to have a special edition ready for printing by noon. That meant all stories had to be in by 11 that morning. We did what we had to do."

Baron outlined several ways that The Globe has changed since he arrived. "Before I started, I read the paper for about a month, cover to cover," he said.

"I think the great strengths of the paper before I got there were a very talented staff with exceptional writers and exceptional reporters. I think it had a tremendous breadth as well as far as what we covered overseas with foreign correspondents," Baron said.

There were several things he chose to concentrate on. "We're now driven by the news," he said. Baron stressed "how much harder-edge we've become."

He believes that The Globe should be the best regional paper in America. "I think our job is to help shape the pub-

Sniper strikes once again

By David Dishneau
ASSOCIATED PRESS

ROCKVILLE, Md. (AP) – A bus driver was shot to death Tuesday as he was about to set out on his morning route in what authorities fear was the 13th attack by the Washington-area sniper. Police also revealed a chilling warning found at a weekend shooting scene: "Your children are not safe anywhere at any time."

Montgomery County Police Chief Charles Moose issued a new plea, urging the gunman to continue a dialogue with investigators.

"It is important that we do this without anyone else getting hurt," he said.

In an extraordinary statement that appeared to confirm authorities are in a desperate parley to stop the killing, the police chief said the sniper had tried to communicate with police over the past several days – and he suggested the gunman had made demands.

"We have researched the options you stated and found that it is not possible electronically to comply in the manner that you requested," Moose said. "However, we remain open and ready to talk to you about the options you have mentioned."

He said the sniper was seeking an 800 telephone number to talk with authorities, and he offered to set up a private post office box "or another secure method."

"You indicated that this is about more than violence," said Moose, who had asked the sniper to contact authorities for two days before Tuesday's slaying. "We are waiting to hear from you."

He refused to take questions from reporters.

The sniper has killed nine people and critically wounded three others in Maryland, Virginia and Washington since Oct. 2. Authorities were awaiting ballistics tests to confirm that bus driver Conrad Johnson is the killer's latest victim.

Johnson, 35, was gunned down in Aspen Hill, the same community in suburban Washington where the attacks began.

He was shot once in the abdomen just before 6 a.m. as he stood on the top step of his bus, setting off a police dragnet and snarling traffic in the suburbs north of the nation's capital. Johnson, a married father of two children, died later at a hospital.

The warning about children's safety was discovered by police outside a steakhouse near Richmond, Va., where the sniper critically wounded a man Saturday night. Moose said the warning came in the form of a "post-script," but refused to describe the rest of the note.

However, a senior law enforcement official speaking to The Associated Press on condition of anonymity said the note demanded $10 million. It was unclear whether the demand was linked to the options outlined by Moose.

Schools in the Richmond area remained closed for a second day Tuesday, idling more than 140,000 students. School officials had cited information from police in shutting down, prompting questions for Moose, whose office is leading the sprawling investigation.

Moose said investigators recognized "the concerns of the community" and decided to provide the "exact language that pertains to the threat."

The Virginia schools will reopen Wednesday under heightened security. As of Monday evening, no Maryland schools had decided to close.

Panel of scholars discuss war on Iraq

By Courtney Charles
COLLEGIAN STAFF

A panel of scholars discussed the likelihood of a war with Iraq that would cost about $100 billion to an audience of about 35 last night in the Student Union Ballroom. The speakers on the panel were Anita Dancs, Ph.D. Prof. Gerald Epstein, Prof. Mars Wilson, and Prof. Mohamed Ali. The event was sponsored by Phi Beta Sigma.

According to the National Priorities Project (NPP), the war would cost the state of Massachusetts $2.58 billion. One hundred billion dollars is three times what the federal government spends on K-12 education, enough money to provide health care to all uninsured children in the United States for five years. It is more than four times the total international affairs budget, according to the NPP.

Each panelist was given two questions to answer in five to seven minutes. Dancs was first asked what would be the impact on the United States federal budget for invading Iraq. According to Dancs, there are two costs. One is the cost of military action and the other is the cost of an occupation of Iraq.

Dancs said the cost estimate of an occupation would be approximately $16-46 billion a year, with a minimum of a ten-year occupancy.

"It is foolhardy to pin down an actual price of this war," Dancs said. According to Dancs, allies paid for 80% of the United States' cost of the Persian Gulf War. No one but Kuwait has promised monetary support if the U.S. invades Iraq, so the US will bear most of the costs, she said.

According to Dancs, spending money on the war is not the best use of federal resources to provide security to the U.S.

"The U.S. has not always been the good guy," Danes said.

The reasons to go to war presented by the Bush administration are mostly false according to Epstein. The belief that Saddam Hussein is a madman and that therefore deterrents couldn't possibly work is also false, he said.

"So why does the Bush administration have an obsession with going to war with Iraq?" Epstein asked. He said the most important reason was elections and the many serious problems with the economy.

"The only economic plan the Bush administration has is to cut income taxes for the wealthiest people," Epstein said. Americans are also worried about corporate scandals, he said.

"The Bush Administration wants to divert attention from the scandals because the administration itself is implicated in them," said Epstein. Epstein said another fundamental reason for the war is oil.

The major threat Iraq poses to the world would come from an invasion of Iraq, according to Epstein. An invasion would generate more animosity towards the U.S. and may create destabilization in other parts of the world, he said.

Wilson explained the history of how Iraq got a leader like Saddam Hussein.

"I don't think Saddam Hussein is popular. But when you have a choice between your leader and people who are dropping bombs on you, there is no ground opposition to your leader," Wilson said.

Ali discussed the attitudes of people in the Middle East. According to Ali, the people question why the U.S. always protects Israel.

"Globalization and the U.S. are pushing to control the Middle East and to push the Middle East in a direction which serves and helps the economy of the West and the U.S.," Ali said in his discussion of attitudes.

Audience members seemed to take something positive away from the speech.

"I think it was brilliant. I could completely see what Epstein was saying," said Fabiola Loiser, a junior Economics major.

"I thought it was very informative. Usually we view America as the country that does nothing wrong," said Franklin Omuoha, 20, a junior Legal Studies major. "It was interesting to find out the America has dirty laundry."

German director visits UMass

By Jen Hodson

German film director Hans Barlo visited the University of Massachusetts to speak with students about his career as a producer and head of the German Film Academy. Barlo was in North America to promote his work at the Film Culture Center in Northampton.

Barlo's own works included Nacht über Berlin (Night Above Berlin), Wahrer als der Tag (Truer Than Day) and Lügner (Liar). The Liar" is a film about a man who invents heroic news bulletins about Allied advances against the Nazis to help suppress the overwhelming sadness and depression that exists within the ghetto. Barlo's radio helps spread hope and optimism to people who are in need of it. Today the only East German movies mentioned are Academy

Barlo, who is a major film director, has produced over 50 productions and DEFA studio, and is also on the board of directors for DEFA productions in Germany. He has studied with Max Ophuls and other important German film makers at the famous Babelsberg Film School. UMass and the University of Massachusetts Amherst have a long history of German studies and have been the host of many German film festivals. Barlo's visit to the Five College area was part of the DEFA Project, which is a program that promotes the study of German film and culture.

Barlo's visit to UMass was part of a seminar class taught by Professor Jerry Carlson. The class is titled "Cinema and Memory: Representing the Past in German Film." Barlo's visit to the class was to discuss the film Die Architekten (The Architects), which was directed by Peter Kahane. Kahane's film is based on a novel of the same title by Erich Loest and is about a family in the last years of the East German state. Beyer's 1998 television film, Abgehauen (Getting Away) is based on an autobiographical book by German actor Manfred Krug. In it, confrontations with state authorities by East German artists after the 1976 expulsion of Wolf Biermann are examined. He wrote and published his memoirs in 2001 with Wenn der Wind sich dreht (When the Wind Turns).

"The lecturers who come here are very interesting and they have a lot of knowledge from their travels from around the world," said student Justin Fries who attended the event.

Dr. Barton Byg, Director of DEFA Film Library, said that it is a national film tour going across North America and will include pictures from Japan, Great Britain and Israel. With the help of the UMass Arts Council, the photo exhibit will go with the tour.

"It's just so thrilling to have UMass be the crossroads of these three events today," Byg said. "This Oscar-nominated director, who is on an eight week tour of the United States, is here all week at UMass and the colleges, so it's just an amazing week and it's a very exciting activity."

Sports fanaticism:

Has it gone too far?

The 15-year old son of William R. Ligue Jr., 34, pled guilty to attacking a Kansas City Royals coach during a baseball game. The boy and his father were charged with the September assault of K.C. coach Tom Gamboa during a regular season game between the Royals and the Chicago White Sox.

Mr. Ligue is in custody awaiting his arraignment on Nov. 2 while his son could face jail time. This incident is just another example of fans at sporting events getting out of hand.

We have yet to hear any reason behind the seemingly random attack on Gamboa, but despite its motivation, major sporting contests have become unsafe and sometimes lethal events to attend.

Last week, ESPN's "Outside the Lines" touched on the subject of fanaticism in sports. In essence, host Bob Ley begged the question, does sports occupy too large a space in our society?

Our answer to that is yes.

Although it is certainly a nationwide problem, this issue is blatantly visible right here on campus.

When riots break out in the quad of the Southwest living area because of a baseball game between the New York Yankees and the Boston Red Sox, we see this as a problem.

When crazed football fans begin to burn material objects and overuse their previously covered cellulite simply because the Patriots won the Super Bowl, we see this as a problem.

When student fans at the Mullins Center for basketball games chant "Bye, bye, Brutiser," at departed coach James "Brutiser" Flint, we see this as a problem.

When some Major League stadiums ban "Yankees Suck" T-shirts from the ballpark but UMass students are regularly seen sporting shirts, bumper stickers, hats and patches with the same slogan, we see this as a problem.

When a Collegian columnist writes an opinion piece about how Red Sox fans are bitter toward New Yorkers, and he receives e-mails and letters that threaten the life of him and his family, we see this as a problem.

It's not as if we are slamming our gavel and calling all sports fans out of order, but we do ask for some decorum. The role that sports plays in many of our lives is nothing to be ashamed of when it doesn't interfere with the livelihoods of others.

But when sports fanaticism breaches the line into safety and lifestyle issues, that is when we make our call for etiquette.

What happened to, "It's not whether you win or lose, it's how you play the game?" It seems like that phrase has been fudged more than a little. We understand that nobody wants to lose, and our society is built around competitiveness, but that doesn't mean chivalry and respect are dead.

So the next time that you attend a sporting event, be it a Bruins game this winter, a Red Sox game next spring, or any of the multitude of games that occur each and every week right here on this very campus, use your head and have some common sense.

Sports are supposed to be a fun escape from the stresses of the rest of life. Let's not ruin our safe haven with acts of stupidity.

The news authority…we think

ERIC MARTIGNETTI

I got home Saturday night around 11:15. I was a really tired yet, so I decided to tune in the TV. Fortuitously, the TV was already on Fox Five Sports Channel. Unfortunately, there was a report of another shooting potentially linked to the sniper in the Virginia-Maryland area. A man had been shot in the stomach in the parking lot of his restaurant in Kent, and his wife had been eaten. That last bit of the timeline is mine, and yet the rumors began to circulate.

In fact, they did not even know if the shooting was linked to the sniper; they assumed it was. They did not know whether I-95 was the escape route for the shooter, or the red herring. Maybe the shooter took the back roads. This time there was no description of a white truck or a white Chevy Astro van or an off-white (possibly creamcolored) Ford van. There were no descriptions at the shooter or shooters, their dark skin or light skin, their Afr. 42 or Mr. T fro. There was no witness whose testimony had been falsified.

Nevertheless, despite the absolute lack of facts and/or evidence, the news channels were on the air at 1:30 a.m. five hours after the shooting had occurred.

There was speculating and guessing, assuming and presuming, circulating and perpetuating. There was everything except facts. The lighting in the parking lot may have been dark, may have been bright, but was most likely moderate. Sheer brilliance. I may have eaten breakfast. I may have eaten dinner, but I most likely ate lunch yesterday. Such eyewitness testimony adds no new knowledge to any inquiry. The reporters floated in, disgusting themselves as breaking news, yet the facts were still the same.

The news networks rounded up the usual suspects of forensic pathologists, psychologists, experts, and analysts to evaluate but Keyser Söze, but no one with anything new to say. They were there because their approach in the parking lot of the restaurant wasn't, but their "speculation," apparently trumped the reporters' "non-expert speculation." Even Anna Nicole Smith possesses the faculties to be an expert commentator on this story. But rumors are rumors, even if gained in the form of expertise.

The truth is that the media had been reporting on a story for over a week where the facts had changed only ever so slightly from the first few incidents.

Many channels pointed out that the five-day layoff had been the longest since the string of shootings began. Now, I don't think that the media is hoping for more shootings. Quite the contrary, they want the sniper caught, as we all. But the media acted as though the five-day drought was some kind of slump, like Tom Brady or Ted Williams' three starts—a three game layoff since his last victory. To treat the sniper with such meticulous forensics is not the media's job. The media's job is to report the facts. There were very few new facts, hardly worth enough hours, or even days, of coverage.

"The lighting in the parking lot may have been dark, may have been bright…"

Perhaps the worst consequence of the sniper shooting is the lack of attention to other factual news. North Korea has chemical weapons; we are going to war with Iraq; and Joint Intelligence Committee hearings on 9/11 are perhaps the most important hearings since Watergate. Yet the media persists to cover the sniper. Meanwhile, the sniper, who according to most "experts" is looking for attention, is reveling in publicity. The police have gone from hating the media for proliferating false accounts to using them as a conduit to relay messages to the sniper.

I do not mean to trivialize the shootings. The sniper is dangerous, the deaths he or she has caused are tragic, and I empathize with all those who have friends or family in the DC area. However, by spreading rumors and concentrating on speculation rather than facts, the media only aids the sniper in confusing and frightening the general public. I understand that part of the media's job is to inform the public. There is no excuse, though, for puzzling us.

I do believe that the media have been somewhat helpful in their reporting. They have been timely and thought provoking. They have let us know and feel for the victims. As for prudence and accuracy, those journalistic tenets have been neglected. The media is only doing half of its job and it shows.

Maybe by writing this I am, in a way, giving the sniper unwarranted publicity. But I feel that it is important to be vigilant of what the media tells us. Otherwise, we allow the media to be sniped by the sniper.

Writing ablaze within

McKENDRY

Ask any person who works in the Collegian newsroom, maybe outing the photographers, when they first learned to love writing and almost every one of them will have a story to tell you. Each story will be unique, but many will share an almost unmistakable feature: that there was one special person. This was the person who lit the flame that illuminated the joy of be it the traditional pen and paper or keyboard and monitor as today's terms. Call this person a muse.

I think when we first learn the alphabet, words and the formation of simple sentences when we're all little kids in elementary school we all began our trek along a lifetime of writing. It definitely comes easier for some than others. Yet a common theme in a young age is that writing is a chore. A gifted few seem to identify at such a young age, but it's rare. This happened for all subjects. I'm sure most ten year olds were not captivated by the base two system in mathematics like I was in the fifth grade, but it happens. As it happens, I was one of those kids that saw writing mostly as a chore. There was the occasional creative writing piece that allowed my imagination to run wild, but more often than not I saw the papers just as assignments. This continued throughout junior high. It's not that I was bad at it either, it just didn't hold my interest. I can remember writing papers for seventh and eighth grade that were if the subject remotely interested me, my main purpose was to get as many rewrites as needed to get an A.

My views more than likely would have continued, but not for my freshman English teacher, Mr. McCarthy. It was in this class that we wrote more than I had ever before. I still remember a presentation and paper on a person considered by us to be a hero. As a less people I had wanted to write about were stuck suffering from a bad case of writer's block. I select a very unusual hero. At the age of 14, I argued that the term could be applied to Gene Roddenberry, creator of "Star Trek." To me, I had my classmates were convinced. I could tell that my teacher appreciated my efforts and persuasive techniques for writing. To the small extent.

I was ecstatic over the fact that in sophomore year, Mr. McCarthy told I would need again resume the role of teacher and student. His papers continued including the very topic of my paper. Most college student have written plenty of them by now, but how many were writing them constantly in high school, those in honors English with Mr. McCarthy and both those and small second semester of freshman year. A writing course in college helped me the importance of exposing myself as students to the types of papers we'd be writing for years to come and that getting us in good practice of writing down our opinions and learning how to defend them in a clear and logical manner.

Writing assignments that for many years had seemed like a hassle, just another way to earn a grade, suddenly became opportunities. It was a chance for I, Regan McKendry, to express the many thoughts that swirled in my brain. Even if the paper was nothing more than a topic based off of a novel that we had finished reading, supposedly (did anyone really read all their high school English stories?), it was my vehicle to produce whatever work I felt relevant.

The grades didn't seem to matter as much anymore either. I always had been, and at some times still am, driven by the grade, the end results. A lot of students are. Yet this was one area where my feelings on that matter changed. With only one alliance to rewrite a paper, I had to accept the fact that sometimes my writing would be flawed, imperfect. Yet I also grew to realize that as long as I worked my hardest, that a B on my paper was nothing to be ashamed of, for the meat of the paper, my ideas and thoughts, were still there. Next time, I would just have to work harder at improving the technique and grammar.

Even during the junior and senior years of high school, when I was not enrolled in one of Mr. McCarthy's classes, the love of writing continued. With each piece that Miss Doyle or Mr. Parrella dished out at us, I took a certain amount of pride in producing as creative a piece as I could. Even with those papers that were about stories that totally lacked my interest, knowledge of the English language proved a powerful tool in being able to turn nothing into something (i.e. I knew how to bullsh__) like a pro).

Senior year was the vindication of much of the work put in during earlier writing sessions. The two essays I used on my college applications were both highly personal pieces that touched on who I was as a person, not just something thrown together to look good. One referred to a stressful period during my junior year when writing, in the form of poetry, helped me cope. It was in senior year as well when writing in a journal kept me sane while a friend spent four days in a coma and the next month in a rehab hospital following a skiing accident.

In the classroom, it was my last writing assignment for literary analysis that was my most fulfilling. In being asked to compare Ken Kesey's On the Road to another piece of literature we had read during our four years in high school and which novel was more influential, I went against my teacher's presumption. I drew back to the first books from sophomore year: Ragged Dick and Mark the Match Boy, two of the many stories written by Horatio Alger. In making the argument for two pieces of literature that many scholars would consider elementary in relation to the great beat writer, I knew that I was facing an uphill battle.

When the paper was returned to my desk, I had a glow about me that shone the rest of the day. Mr. Parrella, who had often been a difficult grader of our writing, had given me an A for both grammar and content, with the comment that while he disagreed with my views, that I had presented them in a clear and logical manner. More simply put, I wrote something that my teacher disagreed with and had come out on top. I showed Mr. McCarthy later that day as I beamed with pride, as proof of the lessons he had taught me only a few years prior.

It was about this time last year that I wrote a column in memory of my teacher, who had recently passed away from cancer. I'm not here to sum up what my teacher, my mentor, and my friend meant to me; I did that a year ago. Instead I hope to strike a chord with each of you. Everyone of us has had a Mr. McCarthy in our lives. They are the ones who pushed us to our every limit, and then pushed a little more, knowing that we were capable of achieving greatness in whatever the endeavor be it writing, mathematics, athletics, or performing.

I began writing columns around the same time that Mr. McCarthy passed away. As an engineer, it's the first real writing I've gotten to do since my first semester college writing course. I often wonder what thoughts he'd have to share about my writings. I know this is impossible, yet I can't help but think that somewhere up in heaven he's sitting there, giving me that little spiritual push to test my limits.

My love of writing burns deep to my soul. It is a flame that simply cannot be extinguished. Mr. McCarthy, for lighting the match, I humbly say thank you.

Letter to the Editor

To the Editor:

The blame for lack of school spirit at UMass does not rest solely with the apathy of the student body. Many things affect presence of spirit at a college or university, and the establishment of a real sense of spirit at our school will take a lot more than a sudden change of heart in our students. True spirit comes from a strong desire to identify with one's school, and that only comes when students are truly proud of where they study, not from a simple appreciation of the hard work of the unsuccessful athletic teams.

I am currently on exchange at Louisiana State University, and here I have learned a great deal about spirit. First, I will admit that at a school in a region where football is as much as part of life as eating and sleeping, it is much simpler to build and maintain connection with a university. Each weekend here in Baton Rouge, over 100,000 people swarm the campus wearing head-to-toe purple and gold for a day of tailgating and revelry capped, more often than not, by an LSU victory. People here love their school partially because of their pride in athletics and partially because of the connection they feel to their schools when they can participate in such events surrounded by like-minded peers. There is power in that ability to bring people together that should not be ignored.

Why should UMass fans feel obligated to support the home team when they don't win? According to Chancellor Lombardi, "intercollegiate athletics is about winning," and I couldn't agree more. Athletic success brings money and prestige to the University, and our well-compensated varsity athletes should succeed. LSU has built that success and has been reaping the benefits. And if northern culture won't support football, we should do it with basketball. Ask anyone who was on campus with Marcus Camby how the spirit was then, and you'll know its possible. Without success, our athletic programs will not create any gains in spirit or in anything else for that matter.

The other thing that I have learned here is that the spirit of most LSU students goes way beyond interest in football. The people here care deeply about the history and traditions of their school. At convocation, the student government passed out an 80-page pictorial detailing the history of the school, words to the alma mater and fight song, list of school traditions, famous alumni, and a huge array of other points of pride. There are student organizations devoted solely to promoting history and spirit amongst LSU students, and students here are involved at a level I don't see at UMass. Ask yourselves what you know about this transition to a badass rocker. You know why? It's because he's not meant to be one.

Ahh, Kevin Bacon. He's the lead singer of The Bacon Brothers that is made up of – yep, you guessed it – his brother Michael and himself! That's creativity at its best, folks. Their tours basically consist of sketchy bars and what not.

The Accelerators are proud to have Bruce Willis as their lead singer. This blues-rock band pretty much plays the same scene as Mr. Bacon. You must admit that it's a pretty gnarly band name, though. Okay, maybe not.

Jordan Catalano of "My So-Called Life" (a.k.a. Jared Leto) is the lead singer of 30 Seconds to Mars. The band had the rare privilege to briefly tour with Incubus recently. I wonder if that's because Jared got to make out with Claire Danes during his younger years.

Let us not forget surfer-stud Keanu Reeves. He plays bass for his rock band, Dogstar. Dogstar has been around for a few years and, to shocking surprise, has not been that successful. Hey Keanu, stick to bending over backwards in fight scenes on the silver screen.

The only reason why these bands are somewhat "well-known" is that the band is lucky enough to have a famous actor performing alongside with them. The band's talent is almost equivalent to that of an adolescent garage band. I don't know what Russell, Kevin, Bruce, Jared, and Keanu are thinking, to tell you the truth. Do they want to become rock stars because they actually love music, or to make themselves even more famous than they really are?

I'm sure that the boys mentioned above really are passionate about music, but the only reason they are living their rock star dream half-assed is because they were famous beforehand. It's not fair for those who are actually talented. There are so many gifted musicians out there who are struggling to make it in the world of music, yet find themselves caught in the shadows of established faces. There's actually real talent out there, and I find it really unfortunate that these musicians are overlooked because it would be really "cool" if ex-Gladiator Russell Crowe would pick up a microphone and see what he can do with it.

So here's my advice to Russell, Kevin, Bruce, Jared, and Keanu –that's real special that you might have a slight musical flare in your flesh and blood, but get with it. You are actors, not rock stars.

The bottom line is that spirit is substance, and pride in that substance. If UMass cannot build that tradition itself, and make their students proud to be Minutemen, no one can complain about the resulting apathy. UMass has strengths, but it needs to learn to promote them while building its weaknesses. Until then, go tell someone why you love UMass and make them love it too, then maybe we'll be headed somewhere.

Mark Morris Dance Group dance their way to rapturous applause

By Christine Papazidis
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

I sat down in the audience of the Fine Arts Center Concert Hall, eagerly awaiting the start of the Mark Morris Dance Group performance this past Thursday night. While I was sitting there waiting for the performance to start I started to recall memories of my past dance recitals from age three to 17. I love watching dancers floating themselves into different poses and positions. I will admit that even though I was a dedicated dancer for eighteen years, I have not gone to many different types of dance performances. So I sit there curious of what is to come.

The performance was broken up into four pieces, yet each piece had many other sub-divisions. The first selection was entitled, "New Love Song Waltzes." All the dancers were dressed in different blue and black combinations. The type of dancing was modern dancing but different kind of modern dance than I have ever seen. In general, modern dancing breaks all the rules of prim and proper ballet dancing, even though modern dancing comes from ballet technique. The dancers were extremely flexible, strong and beautiful. There was a lot of partnering within the dancers, male-male, male-female, and female-female. I found this to be interesting because one mostly thinks that the male carries and lifts the female in dancing, where as in this piece and throughout the whole performance male and females intertwined with one another to display a more unique message.

Another unique feature of the first piece was that of singers, consisting of a soprano, mezzo-soprano, tenor and baritone, all singing along with live piano accompaniment to the dancing selection. I have never seen or heard singers in a dance performance unless it was a musical. At some points I felt as though the singers were overpowering the dancers. Don't get me wrong, the musicians of this performance were so talented, they could have put on a performance of their own. The singers took too much of the attention away from the actual dance.

The second piece was much different from the first. It was entitled "Going Away Party." The number had a western theme and was made up of the music of Bob Wills and His Texas Playboys. The costumes were very bright and western-like. It was a very comical piece where a lot of the movements of the dancers went along with specific lyrics to the music. The female dancers were paired up with male dancers and would play "hard to get" all throughout the piece. Movements in the selections ranged from fast, to flowy, to a good time hoe down. There was one point where there were just three couples and a guy on stage just flowing in and out of one another. It was so simple yet so beautiful.

Following the intermission were two more numbers, "Bijoux" and "V." "Bijoux" was very interesting. It was a solo number with a very talented dancer, whom it was difficult to take your eyes off. She was also in the previous piece where she stole your attention. The number was broken up into little short stanzas of poems. Each of the stanzas was a short dance, different from the next.

"V" consisted of the majority of the cast. This selection was very melodic and much more lyrical then the other pieces. Crawling on the floor was a major dance move within this selection. Once in a while someone would just walk, or run across the stage. The particular feel formed a much different visual and emotional picture then what a characterized "ballet" would normally make. If one of the dancers made a mistake, the audience would not know because the movements were at random. Very little was done in unison with every dancer on stage. The costumes for this number shifted one's focus to the bodies of the dancers. Half the dancers were wearing a liquid-like blue fabric with short shorts, and the others were wearing soft linen-like material top and bottom. Whenever the dancers would move, their clothing would move that much more, completing the movement.

Mark Morris Dance Group was an interesting, different and extremely talented group. Every one of the dancers have come from a wide range of experiences and opportunities, from singing at Carnegie Hall to graduating from the University of California at Berkeley with a double major in molecular biology and dance. A well-earned standing ovation was given to the performers at the end of their performance.

ROCK 'N' OUT
With Samara Marblestone

Let's play a game. I'm going to name some actors, and you guess what links them together: Russell Crowe, Kevin Bacon, Bruce Willis, Jared Leto, and Keanu Reeves.

Give up? Let me help you.

They all have decided to "brilliantly" expand their talent and turn into rock stars. Oh yeah – they also have another thing in common.

They are really bad rock stars.

Can actors successfully be both an actor and a rock star? Many primary rock stars such as Mandy Moore, Britney Spears and Eminem have made the transition from the stage to the silver screen, but can the opposite happen to primary actors?

Umm, no. Let's talk about this a little.

Academy Award winner Russell Crowe is the lead singer of his six-member Australian rock band, 30 Odd Foot of Grunts. Sound yummy? I didn't think so either. There's something about Russell Crowe that doesn't rub me the right way. Hey Keanu, stick to bending over backwards in fight scenes on the silver screen.

The only reason why these bands are somewhat "well-known" is that the band is lucky

Mr Lif creates 'Dirt Hop'

The highly thoughtful Mr Lif is one of the most stylish producers in hip hop today.

After a long break, Boston's Mr Lif, whose EP dropped in Nov. 2000, finally released his full-length debut album. Mr Lif hasn't been dormant since the EP, though. On the contrary, he toured for the EP and then dropped another LP (Emergency Rations), a live album (Live from the Middle East), and took a break all before releasing I Phantom. He returned with I Phantom, an album that is very different from what might be expected from him. I Phantom is a concept album about the game of life, as its cover art depicts. Inside the sleeve even lies a key for the listener to follow along with while listening to the album. The album follows a story of a main character (played by Lif) through his dreams, jobs, marital life, and death.

The album begins with Lif as a flood running around doing stick-ups trying to make it on the streets in "A Glimpse at the Struggle," which ends with Lif shot dead on a convenience store floor. The second track sets off with a sick beat compliments of EP. Here, Lif is resurrected by people in the future so

VH1 to premiere behind-the-scenes look at Michael Jackson's short film 'Ghosts'

Jackson endured hours of make-up work for his artsy and frightening 40 minute video "Ghosts."

By Michael DaSilva
COLLEGIAN CONTRIBUTOR

Before Britney Spears, before Usher, before 'N Sync, there was Michael Jackson – the artist who single handedly revolutionized the music video. And before there were shows like "Total Request Live" and "Making the Video" to help pam performers in the right direction on what a music video should look like, there were Michael Jackson videos to serve that function, such as "Billie Jean" and "Beat It." This Saturday at midnight VH1 is going to world premiere a behind-the-scenes look similar to "The Making of Thriller" at Michael Jackson's short film "Ghosts" – for all to see how the magical creative process of creating a Michael Jackson masterpiece comes together.

It's hard to imagine an MTV without perceptively captivating and entertaining videos for at least an MTV that was incapable of producing such videos, but that is exactly what the rookie cable station was in the early 1980s. When MTV first began it was in dire need of music videos because most major artists at the time hadn't yet begun filming videos. MTV hadn't yet proven itself to be a viable vehicle for boosting an artist's record sales.

At the time there was a popular debate brewing amongst musicians – on whether or not music videos enhanced or devalued a song. A memorable press conference that staged the debate placed the then up and coming superstar Madonna against John Oates of the duo Hall and Oates. Never camera shy, Madonna championed the idea of music videos, where as Oates felt that videos took away from a listener's ability to use his or her imagination in envisioning what the song was about.

And of course there was the prophetic theory, video, and song "Video Killed the Radio Star," that hypothesized the feared career death of a successful musician by radio, but who was not attractive enough to be adored by television viewers. All of the uncertainty that surrounded MTV drew many artists away. So in the early '80s the station would play anything it could get its hands on. This led to programming lists that consisted of whatever musical artists had already made videos at that point in time. Consequently, the majority of these videos came from overseas British rock and pop bands/artists. However good the songs might have been, viewing their accompanying videos was oftentimes less than entertaining, to put it mildly. Cheesy white backgrounds, lack of pre-production/ production/ and post-production, made music videos in 1981-82 look like home videos or school projects that were filmed with the camcorder.

Sadly, very few colored artists appeared on the fledgling station. This all changed when Jackson put his foot down and used his superstar power to get his debut video ("Billie Jean") aired in promotion of his up-and-coming album "Thriller." Billie Jean changed everything. $100,000 was spent on making the video, which at the time was unheard of. And it featured state of the art special effects, innovative dance moves, and something that made it stand out from all other music videos – it had a narrative thread. There was an actual plot to follow while listening to the rhythmic song and viewing its accompanying video.

The success of "Billie Jean" led to even bigger and better things for Jackson and the growth and evolution of the music video. People were beginning to take notice that he was on to something here. With one monumental success already behind him in "Billie Jean," he was allowed more creative freedom for his next landmark video. As an artist and a visionary, the stage was set for history-making magic to unfurl. With "Beat It," Jackson outdid himself and undisputedly created the most entertaining video in MTV's short history. In addition to having a storyline, the video pioneered the now famed dance style of choreography (the superstar up front and the Broadway/choral line cast of dancers behind them) that is still emulated to this day.

Whether it's Christina Aguilera, Missy Elliot, or Sisqo, to even Madonna or Janet Jackson, the choreography blueprint of having the front- man/woman followed by his or her backup dancers was originated in the video for "Beat It."

With both "Billie Jean" and "Beat It" came critical praise and public applause. The success of both MTV and Jackson played off of each other for the benefit of all. The next step was to take the concept of what a music video could be to an even higher level. For "Thriller," Jackson's next video, Animal House and Blues Brothers director John Landis was brought in to direct. MTV even funded the video, as it saw the audience ratings Jackson's videos were bringing in. With a half a million- dollar budget, "Thriller" was more of a short film than it was a music video. It was decades ahead of its time and even to this day is considered the greatest music video ever made (in 1999 MTV and TV Guide officially named it the greatest music video of all time).

What was special about "Thriller," among other things, was the behind the scenes documentary that was filmed during the creation of the music video. "The Making of Thriller" was an introspective look at how much preparation, imagination, and creative energy and magic was put into the music video and subsequently was responsible for its unparalleled success. Similarly, the VH1 special airing this Saturday night will provide a behind the scenes glimpse of the same sheer genius and innovation that led to Jackson's pioneering musical videos. It will be a look at the creative process that helped create a formula for popular musical artists to follow since 1983.

Much like his landmark "Thriller" video, Jackson's "Ghosts" is filled with fright and falls just in time for Halloween.

In essence, what Jackson became to MTV and the music video is what Michael Jordan became to the NBA and the game of basketball – someone who unabodied, achieved, and enjoyed the ultimate pinnacle of success and creativity in their respective field. As the saying goes, imitation is the greatest form of flatters and the majority of artists today on BET, MTV, and VH1 when performing in a music video are "doing" Michael Jackson. Just like any basketball player in the NBA who spontaneously glides through the air to the hoop, lifts his arm to dunk while sticking his tongue out is "doing" Michael Jordan.

What is exciting about this upcoming special is that it's like getting a sneak peak of a magician revealing the secrets to his or her tricks. It's like watching what fuels Shakespeare's pen, what makes Tiger Woods swing so amazing or what gives Serena Williams an edge over her competitors. It's like seeing the creative process of Picasso meticulously perfecting a painting, Michelangelo designing a chapel, or Steven Spielberg cinematically telling a story.

You might remember the video for "Ghosts" as it was frequently aired last year around Halloween. The short film was released in 1996 and shown in select Sony Theaters in the U.S. and Japan. It was later given a grandiose showing overseas at the Cannes film festival in 1997, but was never really given its just due and proper spotlight. Fortunately, last year It was aired repeatedly on MTV and VH1 in conjunction with the release of Jackson's album Invincible. What is new is the behind-the-scenes special airing this Saturday at midnight. VH1 is actually sneaking it in at 2:30 p.m. on Sat. afternoon as well, but it's promoting the midnight airing as the "world premiere," so if you want you can get a double take. To all aspiring dancers, musicians, directors, and anyone who is interested in ever making any sort of music video and/or short musical film in the future… take out your pen and pad and get ready to take notes. It will be interesting to see what secrets and tricks Jackson will reveal. It will most certainly be entertaining and fill you up with that Halloween spirit – as the short film features a haunted house full of ghouls, goblins, and ghosts. Be sure to tune in, I promise it will be one hell of a thriller!

that he can battle the wack hip hop that has taken over. The beat changes halfway through the song as he begins to fight the outrageousness, but ends to the sound of an alarm clock waking up Lif, who is late for work, and signifying that it was all a dream.

"Live From The Plantation" shows Lif's angst at working at a job earning minimum wage for a manipulative boss he hates. The beat comes in three different segments- compliments of J dan (also from the Boston area) and ends with Lif knocking the time clock off the wall and leaving. "New Matts Theme" finds Lif breaking down life with his new freedom and coming to the realization that he is free and better off not being a slave for corporate America. "Status" puts Lif back in his place thanks to Insight who shows up with a $20 beat for the broke Lif and a verse telling of how much of a scrub Lif has become.

This leads Lif on a search for a way to make it and he then falls victim to corporate America on "Success," he gets a well paying job and gets married. Eventually he has a kid, and after the child is born, Lif feels there are not enough possessions for his wife and child so he works all day to get them and never sees his family.

It is at this point that the album loses some of its cohesiveness and breaks away to larger scale, as the father has fallen victim to life and dies. Now Lif talks about civilization as a whole in "Iron Helix" and "Earth Crusher" (both produced by Insight) as he shows the Western way of life taking a tribesman and assimilating him into their way of doing things and all ending up with a nuclear holocaust. The last track is the only multiple collaboration on the album, showcasing the MC's El-P, Jean Grae, Lif, and Akrobatik's perspectives on their last few minutes on Earth before the planet is destroyed. This track is laid out over the dopest El-P beat on the album and ends off with Lif rhyming about all the things he wished he had and hadn't done in his life, but then realizes that it is in vain because now he's out of time.

Although this album is almost a classic, those not familiar with Def Jux recordings and El-P beats may want to give it a listen before buying. El-P is an innovator that has a style of beats that has been described as "Dirt Hop" and is by far one of the greatest producers in hip hop, but he has a very distinctive style because it is so unconventional. Even though his style varies, you always know when he is the one who blessed the song. For all the Def Jux fans, if you don't have it, get it, and for those people who like hip hop as an art form and not just to get down to at the club, give it a chance as well.

Sutton takes over Ryder squad

By Doug Ferguson
ASSOCIATED PRESS

Hal Sutton has agreed to be the Ryder Cup captain for the United States in 2004 after serving as the team's emotional leader as a player.

Sutton met with PGA of America executives last week during the Disney World Golf Classic, according to a PGA Tour source who spoke only on condition of anonymity. He decided to accept the job after talking it over with his family, the source said.

The PGA of America said the captain will be announced Thursday.

The 2004 matches will be played at Oakland Hills Country Club outside Detroit.

Sutton will be in charge of bringing the Ryder Cup back to the United States after the Americans lost to Europe at The Belfry by the largest margin in 17 years. Europe has taken the Ryder Cup home after six of the past nine meetings.

U.S. captain Curtis Strange was criticized for putting his best two players – Phil Mickelson and Tiger Woods – at the bottom of the lineup, although Mickelson wound up losing a critical match to Phillip Price, ranked 119th.

Sutton was asked last week at Disney about the criticism that losing Ryder Cup captains always receive, saying that would never keep him from accepting the job.

"The neat part about that is you're in a big enough position that everybody not making that decision can sit around and criticize you," Sutton said. "If you're afraid to be second-guessed, you better not make any decisions."

Paul McGinley clinched the Ryder Cup for Europe by making a 12-foot birdie on the 17th hole to square his match with Jim Furyk, then tying the final hole for a half-point by making an 8-foot par putt.

"We shouldn't lose these things the way we're losing them," Sutton said last week. "There's way too much talent over here."

Asked about his prospects of being a Ryder Cup captain, Sutton said at Disney that he would be honored if asked.

"Making Ryder Cup teams, whether as a player or a captain, is what you strive to do when you're young or old," he said.

Reached on his cell phone Tuesday, Sutton declined to confirm his selection.

He will be 46 at the next Ryder Cup, although he still plans to play a full schedule on the PGA Tour next year. One reason he was thought to be hesitant about the offer was the appearance that he was giving up on his tour career.

He has won 14 times in a career of amazing peaks and shocking lows.

Sutton was considered golf's next star when he beat Jack Nicklaus in the 1983 PGA Championship at Riviera. He won seven times in his first five years, but then went into a deep slump, winning just one tournament over the next 11 years.

His return to top play was just as stunning.

He won the 1998 Tour Championship, one of six tournaments he has won since turning 40. Another was The Players Championship in 2000, when he went toe-to-toe with Woods in the final round and beat him by one stroke.

3. New Orleans (6-1) – This team is fast becoming everyone's new NFC Super Bowl pick, as running back Deuce McAllister has everyone in the Big Easy asking, "Ricky who?" With Aaron Brooks playing well and a stingy defense, the Saints are probably the team to beat in the NFC, especially after that great come-from-behind win over the 49ers this weekend.

4. Miami (5-2) – I can't drop them any lower because of this weekend's loss to Buffalo, not when "Shoeless" Ray Lucas looked like he was throwing the game the whole way. Four interceptions later and the Dolphins fell to an AFC East rival. Now Cris Carter is on the way. Maybe he can help their clubhouse chemistry the way he did in Minnesota.

5. Denver (5-2) – Shannon Sharpe's monster of a game led his Broncos to an exciting win over the "year-away" Kansas City Chiefs, 37-34. Denver's defense was killed by Chiefs running back Priest Holmes, who scored three touchdowns, but Sharpe and the passing game bailed them out.

6. Philadelphia (4-3) – Only 4-3, but still at No. 6, the Eagles are improving every time out. This weekend's 20-10 drubbing of Tampa Bay showed how long Philly has come and that running back Duce Staley still has some legs under him.

7. Oakland (4-2) – I really hope the Raiders lose next week's game so I can just drop them off the list all together. It's amazing how much the age is already catching up with them. I love that Jon Gruden isn't in the Bay Area anymore, so I don't have to feel guilty about liking him.

8. Tampa Bay (5-2) – Throw it to Keyshawn! I don't understand why Gruden isn't having whichever Johnson playing QB just throw the ball to No. 19. He is one of the few guys who can really just flat-out carry a team in the NFL.

9. San Francisco (4-2) – Tough loss to the Saints this weekend, as it becomes more and more apparent that the Niners must give the ball to Kevan Barlow more and Garrison Hearst less. And what has happened to Jeff Garcia, wasn't he lighting up the scoreboard last season?

10. New England (3-3) – No team really deserves this spot. Here's hoping that the week off has helped the Patriots and they will return to defending Super Bowl Champion form.

My fantasy team

This is getting ridiculous. I lost this week because I just happened to play against Marshall Faulk, who scored four touchdowns, managing to make my Priest Holmes useless. He only scored three touchdowns this week. Maybe I should cut him.

Now my team is in last place at 2-5, despite having the highest points scored total in my conference.

They truly are becoming Lonesome Sundays.

0-fer watch

The Cincinnati Bengals, our last hope to keep the 0-fer watch going, had a bye this week, so they remain at 0-5. The Bungals will then host the Tennessee Titans Sunday. If the Bengals can stink like I know they are capable of in that game, we'll all have to hold our breath the following week, when they take on the expansion Houston Texans in Texas.

I can't even tell you how worried I am about that game.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) – An early start today will enable you to get more done – but much of that will be in a personal vein.
CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) – You may have some trouble as the day opens gathering your forces. Later on, however, you're likely to enjoy more support than you need.
AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) – You mustn't fool yourself into thinking that you deserve anything today that you are not willing to work for in some way. Be realistic.
PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) – You're anticipating something that isn't likely to transpire, but you may be missing signs of something that really is on the way.
ARIES (March 21-April 19) – You're likely to get what you want today – and then some. You'll surely have your hands full on more than one occasion today. Prepare yourself.
TAURUS (April 20-May 20) – You're not likely to agree with many other people today about certain pivotal issues. Your singular point of view suits you well at this time.
GEMINI (May 21-June 20) – A disagreement between friends is no reason for the relationship to an end. You can surely keep any threat from materializing at this time.
CANCER (June 21-July 22) – The only way you can show others exactly what you're after and what you expect is to show them. Your demonstration can be more than constructive.
LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) – You may be tempted to do something out of character today with the sole intent of attracting a new kind of attention. Think twice, however!
VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) – You may feel as though you're "on the spot" today. Put yourself in someone else's shoes and things can be seen in a more balanced fashion.
LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) – You may find yourself caught between two conflicting desires today – and neither one is your own! You can strive for a compromise and achieve it.
SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) – You would prefer to be left to your own devices today; you're not likely to tolerate anyone who keeps trying to "look over your shoulder."

Red Sox interview Schueler for GM

By Ron DiPasquale
Associated Press

BOSTON (AP) - The Boston Red Sox have completed a request from Chicago White Sox general manager Ron Schueler for the same position, team president Larry Lucchino said Tuesday.

Schueler resigned from the White Sox in September. He agreed to join general manager Ken Williams' staff to get out of baseball.

Lucchino said the interview with Schueler was "very positive." He also expressed frustration over an unrelated dispute Commissioner Bud Selig had with general manager Billy Beane, who signed a three-year contract extension in the process.

"There's a risk against tampering and everyone tries to guard it, but there should be room for interviews," Lucchino said. "But there's a process of mutual courtesy and respect in baseball, and I get concerned when we have to resort to anything less."

Boston general manager Mike Port also spoke to Schueler, Oakland A's Dan Duquette and a "fourth or fifth" candidate said Lucchino. Hopefully, Mike will be with the Red Sox for a long time to come either as general manager or in some other area, he said.

Schueler, 34, gained over the GM title in Kenny Williams' office. He also is scheduled to work as a scout and special consultant to owner Jerry Reinsdorf.

Schueler was White Sox general manager for 10 years and stepped down after Chicago won the AL Central title in 2000.

Schueler left the position on good terms with the White Sox, but said he was disappointed with the slide in team chemistry the past two years.

During Schueler's tenure, the White Sox released Carlton Fisk, traded Sammy Sosa, signed Michael Jordan and brought in the temperamental Albert Belle. The White Sox were 817-734 and went to the playoffs in 1993 and 2000.

He pitched for Atlanta, Philadelphia, Minnesota and the White Sox in the 1970s, posting a 40-48 record and a 4.08 earned run average over eight seasons.

In September, Schueler said he would like to run a team again.

"I missed it," he said then. "There's a lot of stress in the job, a lot of time that has to be devoted to it. But it gets in your blood."

The Red Sox are scheduling an interview with Philadelphia Phillies scouting director Mike Arbuckle '51 for Boston's vacant general manager job.

In addition to Schueler and Arbuckle, Lucchino said he has interviewed one candidate and is setting up an interview for another. He would not identify either candidate.

Bellini strikes twice

Freshman leads UMass in split

By Matt Brady

GERALD HINDS/COLLEGIAN

Freshman Lindsey Bellini scored two goals to lead her team past Duquesne on Friday, earning Atlantic 10 Rookie of the Week honors for her effort.

Strange beds. Different sights. Bus travel. A foreign feel to the field. No matter what abnormality proves to be the one that stands out, it's always more difficult to play on the road.

The Massachusetts women's soccer team fought to split a pair of weekend conference games on the road to move to 3-4 in the Atlantic 10 this season. The Minutewomen topped Duquesne (3-9-1, 1-5-1 A-10) 2-1 in Pittsburgh on Friday before falling to St. Bonaventure (10-3-0, 4-3-0 A-10) in Olean, N.Y. by a 2-0 count on Sunday.

Bonnies freshman Kristen Walczewski scored just more than a minute into Sunday's game and the Bonnies never looked back en route to a 2-0 shutout of the Maroon and White. Walczewski took a pass from A-10 scoring leader Lisa Nicola and put the ball behind UMass goalkeeper Kelly Nigh (three saves) to give St. Bonaventure the early lead.

Senior Breanne Kraly was solid in net at the other end as the Bonnie defense clamped down on the Maroon and White offense. Kraly was the star, as the Minutewomen outshot their counterparts 14-11 in the game, with Kraly making eight saves for her first career shutout.

"The win showed great maturity in sticking to the game plan and shutting out a very good team," second-year Bonnies coach Dan Manger said in a press release. "What a day [for Kraly] to pick to have her first career shutout."

The Bonnies put the icing on the victory in the 73rd minute, when junior Erin Johnson placed a solid corner on the noggin of freshman defender Lois Bennett. It was the rookie's sixth goal of the season, putting her tied for seventh in the conference.

It was the Bonnies' fourth consecutive win, putting them just two shy of the record for wins in a season (12), set in 1990.

Things were far better for the Maroon and White two days earlier, however, as freshman Lindsey Bellini used a little magic to pull out two goals in the final 5:29 to vault the Minutewomen past Duquesne by the 2-1 final.

"To come back like this goes to show the character that these kids have," said UMass Head Coach Jim Rudy, who is in his 15th year at the University, in a press release. "We played our most skillful game of the year and it was a deserved victory. I have to give a lot of credit to their goalie. We definitely had our fair share of chances."

The game was scoreless for the majority of the contest, with netminders Nigh and the Dukes' Kristin Scharphorn going save for save at their respective ends of the pitch.

Then at the 71:40 mark, UMass picked a tough situation to give up its first penalty kick of the season. Duquesne's Katie Schwager put the kick past Nigh to give her squad the late lead.

Things looked dismal for the Maroon and White, but with just 5:29 left in the contest, it received a huge contribution from its freshman phenom. Classmate Adair Bilyler sent a pass to Bellini, who knotted the game at one, seemingly with overtime on the horizon.

Bellini had more magic planned for the afternoon.

She drew a penalty kick of her own with less than two minutes remaining in the game, blasting a shot past Scharphorn (11 saves) to put the Minutewomen ahead for good. Nigh added 11 saves of her own to propel the Maroon and White defense.

Duquesne outshot the Minutewomen 17-15, led by Lauren Bracco (five shots, four on goal) and Maureen Moran (four, three). The Dukes also held the edge in corners (7-6), but the Minutewomen held an 11-10 second-half shot advantage.

Bellini led the way for UMass, putting all eight of her shots on net.

Bellini earned A-10 Rookie of the Week honors for her performance, and now has five goals on the season.

Carter hits the beach after turning in horns

Cris Carter speaks to the media after signing a one-year contract to play wide receiver for the Miami Dolphins on Monday in Miami Carter, 36, will resume his National Football League career after beginning this season as a television analyst.

Cris Carter is coming back to football. It was announced earlier this week that the former Minnesota great signed a one-year deal with the Miami Dolphins.

Apparently, when the Dolphins first spoke with Carter to come out of retirement, he was reluctant to give up his job with HBO as a member of the "Inside the NFL" team, but it was former Dolphin quarterback Dan Marino (another analyst for HBO), who talked him into it.

Carter, who has scored 129 touchdowns in his career, will be filling the void in the Dolphins offense left by a season-ending injury to Oronde Gadsden.

Apparently, Randy Moss is looking forward to seeing Carter get creamed by some other teams.

Why couldn't Randy just run him over with his car?

Whaaaaa, Whaaaaaaa....SHUT UP!

I still remember the Panthers players complaining when all of the National Football League "experts" called Carolina the worst 2-0, and then 3-0, team in the game's history.

No one respected them. They couldn't understand why we all refused to call them one of the best teams in the NFL. After all, they had beaten such giants as the Baltimore Ravens, Detroit Lions and Minnesota Vikings, three teams sure to be in the playoffs...In 2006.

Well, it looks like the Panthers have fallen back to their usual lot in life...playing some embarrassing football. After that 3-0 start, Carolina has dropped its last four games. And it isn't like they were playing the All-Madden team in a four-game series, either. The two losses to Green Bay and Atlanta I can deal with, but dropping a contest to Arizona and to Dallas is horrifying.

I suppose that even sportswriters are right once in a while.

with Jim Pignatiello

Way to go, Mr. Jones. Something tells me you have no chance of winning another Super Bowl until you give up some of that power.

It'll never happen.

How 'bout them Cowboys!

I hate Jerry Jones with a passion, but it has nothing to do with the fact that I wish he would hire a "football guy" to run his front office.

With Jones running the player personnel moves, his team has gone from Dynastyland to Loserville (both should really be lands a la Disney World, a la Frontier Land). He selected Quincy Carter in the second round of last year's draft and anointed him the heir to Troy Aikman's QB spot. The only problem is that Carter wouldn't have been selected any higher than in the fifth round and was nowhere near ready to handle the pro game. Give him a few years and maybe young Quincy (named after the sixth President of the United States?) will become a solid QB, but not soon.

Now the Cowboy brain trust has pulled Carter in favor of Chad Hutchinson, who hasn't taken a meaningful snap since his sophomore year of college, in 1997!

If this was college football...

Here is how my top 10 would look:

1. San Diego (6-1) – LaDainian Tomlinson and Drew Brees are playing their rear ends off right now and I love their defense. Last week's amazing overtime win over Oakland turned me into a Charger fan.

2. Green Bay (6-1) – The Pack beat up on Washington and knocked young Redskin QB Patrick Ramsey out of the starting position. Green Bay's defense is getting better and Ahman Green is really starting to hit his stride. Good news for Packers fans, it looks like Brett Favre will be fine after the bye week.

New committee formed

SGA to begin addressing safety issues on campus

Discussion over a Select Committee on Public Safety was presented at last night's Student Government Association Senate meeting.

Previous efforts to form a Select Committee on Public Safety were discussed and all failed at last week's Senate meeting. However, after much debate, Senators agreed to form the committee with guided assistance from the Administrative Affairs and University Policy committees.

Among concerns addressed by the Senate were the lack of commitment to security and Senators' beliefs that it's the administration's job to take care of security on campus, not the SGA's.

"Anyone can be on this committee and it gives an important message to the students that we're listening to them and care about their safety," Chair of Administrative Affairs Adrienne Girard said. "This problem affects us as students and it's important that students have a say in what is going on, despite if the administration is working on safety."

Others disagreed, explaining that they felt the administration is paid to handle issues surrounding safety, and the University Policy committee should handle the situation.

"I do agree that security is important and I agree with passing motions regarding security, but I think it's a waste of time to form a separate committee," Senator Gladys Franco said. "I think it's important to let the administration know that they need to take action. We pay them to do this, that is what their job is."

Issues surrounding the administrations roles within public safety were further debated, as Senators expressed that they felt the administration lacked the leadership needed within this issues. Senators continued by explaining that they felt the administration was not handling nor taking control of public safety on campus.

"The battle of public safety has been brought to our attention and we are not safe," Chair of Finance Pat Higgins said. "We have no power and we can't stop anyone from walking into our building, our advisors can't even stop individuals. I can't even pick up the phone to call a Resident Advisor on duty because it goes against University rules. I can't protect the people in my own building and we deserve a committee to look and deal with these problems."

The motion concerning a Select Committee on Public Safety was further debated and passed by the Senate.

The Senate also questioned a motion presented by the University Policy committee regarding the Greek areas on campus. The motion called for the Senate to ask the administration to secure their housing agreement in maintaining pre-approved housing for the Greek community.

"In recent past the administration has allowed random inspections and discussed altering Greek pre-approved housing for freshman and sophomores on campus," Chair of University Policy Blake Kleepe said. "Our housing is filled by undergraduate freshman and sophomores and its critical to our survival as a Greek community. We want to confirm with the administration that they will keep this housing agreement."

Questions surrounding the Greek area was further discussed by Chair of Ways and Means Brian Thompson who amended the motion by stating that in correlation with pre-approved housing, that the apprehendment of Greeks in the commuter area by specified with the backing of the Administrative Affairs committee.

"We had problems in the past and we were thrown out because of the Greek's housing status on campus and we had a lot of friction and we don't want it to happen again," Thompson said. "Housing issues off campus or on campus need to be answered by the students and right now we have a one year contract with the administration that Greeks are commuters and we need to just fix that for the future right now. This will only enhance this motion."

Senators passed the motion asking that the administration allow for the continuation of pre-approved housing for Greeks as well as declare them as commuter students.

A final motion passed by the Senate asked that the candidate chosen as governor for Massachusetts to fight for higher education and restoration of the University of Massachusetts mission and services for the future. The motion further discussed the lack of support and efforts made by acting Governor Jane Swift in response to last spring's budget cuts.

Islamic group is labeled terrorist organization

By Barry Schweid
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) - The United States on Wednesday branded a group of Islamic extremists in Southeast Asia who are linked to the al-Qaida network as a terrorist organization and asked the nations of the world to dry up its assets.

The group is suspected in the bombing of a nightclub in Bali Oct. 12 that killed more than 180 people, but a senior U.S. official told reporters the United States had made no connection as Indonesian authorities pursue their investigation.

Designation of Jemaah Islamiyah as a foreign terrorist organization by the State Department makes it a crime to contribute funds to it. Also, the group's members are barred from receiving visas to travel to the United States.

The next step, said the official, who spoke to reporters under rules that shielded his identity, is to ask the United Nations to approve sanctions that would freeze the organization's assets, prevent sale of weapons to it, and stop members of the group from entering or traveling to the 190 countries that are U.N. members.

The official said Jemaah Islamiyah is a regional terrorism power that communicates regularly with al-Qaida and some of whose members trained in al-Qaida camps in Afghanistan.

Secretary of State Colin Power, in a statement distributed to reporters, said the United States was sending "a powerful signal" that the countries of Southeast Asia will not tolerate terrorism.

He said "the United States does not wish to imply that we have come to a conclusion about responsibility for the devastating Bali bombings."

Powell did not appear in public, and questions by reporters at the State Department were referred to a senior administration official.

The designation could put pressure on Indonesia to crack down on militants and also strengthen President Bush's hand in talks this weekend with President Megawati Sukarnoputri.

Ever since explosions rocked the nightclub in Bali, the Bush administration has urged Indonesia to take a strong stand against terror.

The Indonesia-based Jemaah Islamiyah has cells operating throughout Southeast Asia. It seeks to create an Islamic state comprising Indonesia, Malaysia, Singapore and the southern Philippines, according to a report in May by the State Department's counterterrorism office.

The official spoke on condition of anonymity.

Before the explosions on the resort island the Bush administration had moved gingerly in dealing with Indonesia on terrorism. Secretary of State Colin Powell said after the blast, "You cannot pretend it (terrorism) doesn't exist in your country."

Powell, who will participate in this weekend's talks, said he hoped the attack "reinforces Indonesia's determination to deal with this kind of threat."

Jemaah Islamiyah will become the 35th organization branded as a terrorist group by the State Department.

This year's department report on terrorism said recent arrests of group members revealed links with al-Qaida, blamed for the Sept. 11 attacks.

According to the report, Jemaah Islamiyah began developing plans in 1997 to target U.S. interests in Singapore.

Last December, Singapore arrested 15 members, some of whom had trained in al-Qaida camps in Afghanistan and planned to attack the U.S. and Israeli embassies and British and Australian diplomatic buildings in Singapore, the report said.

Additionally, it said, Singapore police found forged immigration stamps, bomb-making material and al-Qaida documents in suspects' homes.

Powell had announced a $50 million, three-year anti-terrorism assistance package during a visit to Indonesia in August. The Bali bombing could prompt more U.S. help.

The United States had warned Indonesia in early October that it was becoming a home to terrorists. U.S. Ambassador Ralph Boyce met with Megawati to press for action against terrorist groups.

Bush said he hoped to hear in their upcoming meeting "the resolve of a leader that recognizes that any time terrorists take hold in a country it is going to weaken the country itself."

"There has to be a firm and deliberate desire to find the killers before they kill somebody else," he said.

The Bali bombing, which mostly killed Australian tourists, forced Indonesia's government to acknowledge for the first time that al-Qaida was active in the Southeast Asian archipelago. Some of Indonesia's neighbors had complained Indonesia was reluctant to crack down on Islamic militants.

Sniper slays bus driver

By David Dishneau
Associated Press

ROCKVILLE, Md. (AP) - A slain bus driver was the sniper's 13th victim, police said Wednesday, as anxious parents took their youngsters back to schools despite the chilling warning that "your children are not safe."

Gov. Parris Glendening announced that the state would consider posting National Guard troops at polling places if the sniper wasn't caught by Nov. 5.

"I'm hoping the person is brought to justice long before Election Day," the governor said.

Ballistics and other evidence connected Tuesday's shooting of bus driver Conrad Johnson, 35, to the fatal shootings of nine other people and wounding of three in the Washington area, said Michael Bouchard of the federal bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms.

Addressing criticism that investigators had waited several days to reveal the threat to children found in one of the sniper's notes, Bouchard said if information were made public "before we were ready for it to go out, it inhibits our ability to do the job we need to be doing."

"We're all parents and are certainly concerned about the safety of our kids and of our co-workers," he said. He tried to reassure residents that no vital "information was being withheld from them.

Officials on Wednesday also urged any witnesses to come forward without fear of potential problems with their immigration status, despite authorities detaining two men on Monday in a white van and turning them over to federal authorities for deportation proceedings.

"We just have concerns that some people in the immigrant community didn't come forward," Montgomery County Police Chief Charles Moose said Wednesday. He said witnesses' immigrant status is not the concern of the sniper task force.

Moose read the warning about children at a briefing Tuesday. The message – "Your children are not safe, anywhere, at any time" – was left at the scene of a shooting Saturday night at an Ashland, Va., restaurant he said.

In Henrico County, Va., schools reopened Wednesday after being closed for two days, but under strict security and with no outdoor activity, said Superintendent Mark Edwards. He said parents and school officials were "reeling with emotion."

One of the sniper's victims was a 13-year-old boy who was shot outside his Bowie, Md., school and remains hospitalized in serious condition.

"My kid was fine until he heard on the radio the other day that kids are not safe anytime, anywhere," Andy Wisecarver said Wednesday as he hurried his 8-year-old son into an elementary school in Kensington, Md.

The latest message believed to be from the killer was a letter found near the scene of Tuesday's shooting, two law enforcement sources told The Associated Press on condition of anonymity. The Baltimore Sun, citing

In the name of safety

the media must exercise restraint

Waking up for school in the morning has taken on an entirely new meaning for Washington-area students and parents in the wake of seven shootings that have been tied to a single sniper.

Parents escorted their children back to school on Wednesday morning, following a two-day layoff and chilling statement allegedly left by the elusive sniper that read, in part, "Your children are not safe, anywhere, at anytime." The statement raised the stakes in an already high profile case, with one 13-year-old child barely hanging onto his life after being shot Monday Oct. 7 outside of Benjamin Tasker Middle School in Bowie, Md., the fear of a repeat attack on a youth has area parents conflicted on whether or not to send their children to school.

Heightened security has been put into motion at nearly all schools and in various communities the true indicator, though, has been the collective response from families.

Students attending school yesterday were escorted door-to-door. Parents were lining up their children and shielding them when out in public. Establishments with a usual high-flow of traffic – restaurants, parks, playgrounds, etc. – have been deserted.

Usually a field trip to the nation's capital from Clinton Middle School in Clinton, Md., was cancelled. The fallout of these attacks has quickly surpassed the proximity of the first incident. As with cases we've seen in the past, the concern of a county has become the symbolic worry of a nation. Fitting itself into the middle of all that has been the press.

As students returned, local police and investigators have once again requested that the media hold back in its reports of the case in an effort to retain information that may harm the investigation, particularly now that children have been singled out as targets. Response to the request has been split, and we at The Collegian, as a media outlet, support the request of the authorities.

They were right to withhold the majority of a three-page letter that contained the directed statement ultimately released, an act they maintained would prove "detrimental" to the investigation. In the hands of the mass media, an important piece of the puzzle is reduced to a ticket that sells the evening edition.

They are correct in thinking that the communities can benefit from a wealth of shared information, if it's treated appropriately, in a pertinent fashion. The citizens of these communities – particularly those with children – need the information from a primary source, and not the bloated version that a media interpretation may yield.

They are justified in requesting that the media, forever on the tail of a good story and always willing to overexpose it, hold back in the name of public safety. Don't rush to misinterpret that: the media is an essential tool in relaying this story to the rest of us, but in the name of public concern and safety, it should respond, for the time being, in an appropriate and useful manner. Sensationalized graphics and fringe guests on talk shows correspond to neither of those.

Competing for attendance

A Jehovah's Witness convention took place in the Mullins Center several weeks ago. Yes, the same people who dress up in a suit, carry Bibles and repeatedly ring your doorbell while you lie hidden underneath your kitchen table, shrinking in fear.

This convention was complete with a stage, exotic plants encompassing the floor, and a pool, which I could only assume would be used for baptismal purposes. Despite never stepping foot into the convention itself, I could see, by the traffic backup and the large crowd at the entrance, it was going to be a packed house. Maybe one of the larger crowds the Mullins Center has seen in the past few years. After all, it is getting more apparent that student attendance at UMass sporting events, whether it be at the Mullins Center or not, is at a low. And even if student attendance isn't at an all time low, it still is not anywhere near where it should be.

Granted, sporting teams must win to achieve the best attendance. Winning will bring more fans, more media attention, and more fun to this campus. And right now, many of the University's sports teams are at a turning point, a "rebuilding stage" as it is so commonly referred to, and once these sport- teams are finally "constructed" and a winning tradition ensues, the student attendance will surely rise. With this being understood, there is still a problem when the local fans, who do not attend this University, outnumber the student population at sporting events.

The athletic department specifically the sports information office, has to start catering to the students in order to get them at games. Students do not want to walk all the way to the Mullins Center for tickets to a hockey game; they don't even know when the field hockey team plays, go to a baseball game? Many students would be hard pressed to tell you where the baseball field is, never mind attend a game. This is unacceptable.

I walk through the Campus Center everyday, and I see a nicely constructed ticket booth with a TV screen built into it. In this booth there is a student learning on his hand reading a book, he looks like he is waiting for a bus that is never going to come. This bus he is waiting for is full of students, but they keep passing by, no one is buying tickets. The people visiting the Campus Center aren't there to buy tickets, they are passing through, maybe getting a bite to eat. It is time to start placing ticket booths in prime locations on this campus.

It is simple marketing. While, it may seem like a great idea to place a ticket booth in the campus center, it's not working. So, where else on campus do students commonly convene? Hmm… their dorm rooms and the dining commons come to mind. Why not place a ticket booth in the DC's, because the neon green papers, which are on the tables informing the students about an event, aren't doing the trick. It is time to get an energetic person pushing the tickets to a football game, standing in the entrance to the DC's or better yet, who not in the entrance to a dorm.

It's free for students to get into the athletic events around campus. They don't need to buy tickets. Then why do we make them walk to get the tickets? Hand out the student tickets in the dorms and the DC's. Every night, when I come back to my dorm room there is a menu from Pinocchio's, Athena's, even the cookie peddler… Sugar Jones. This is a great strategy; if I am hungry, I am going to order with the restaurant that I have the menu for – it's staring me in the face, begging me to order. The menu serves as a reminder for me to order from the restaurant. The athletic department can do the same thing. Hand the students tickets for an event as they enter their dorm or the DC. At least they physically have their ticket and it serves as a reminder for them. What is the worst that could happen? They don't use it?

Attendance isn't down for every sport. The basketball team still does well, and despite a few shaky years in the standings, they still have a loyal student following. I argue, this is because of their success in the early nineties. Students have no problem making the trek across campus to see the basketball team play in "The House that Cambs Built." But other sports didn't have a Final Four run eight years ago; therefore, they must rely on the sports information department to get their sport out to the student body.

In order for the students to start coming to the games the teams must start winning and this is most important. But until then, the sports information department has to start competing just as hard as the teams they are trying to sell. They must compete for the student interest on campus, because that is what athletics is all about. They have to sell the women's basketball team to the students, just as Stephen Spielberg promotes his new movie to the country. The athletic department is in direct battle with the local bars, movie theaters, restaurants, and even off-campus parties. All these places are taking students away from the campus and attendance at sporting events is lost. It is time to start bringing them back.

Get into the dorms and hand out schedules, but most importantly hand out tickets. If Domino's Pizza can infiltrate the high tech security system of this campus in an effort to hand out menus, certainly the athletic department can get tickets to students and schedules posted in every corridor of the dorms on campus. There are over fifteen thousand students living on this campus. It is ridiculous that attendance at athletic events falls below three hundred students and at numerous events on campus doesn't even make double digits. There is no need for a billboard in Greenfield telling the local faithful about the games. Lets focus on the thousands of energetic young fans that are sitting in their dorm rooms just waiting for the athletic department to give them something better to do. The Jehovah's Witnesses are turned down at almost every house they turn to, people hide in fear that they might ring their doorbell next. With the negative connotations about the Jehovah's Witnesses aside, lets give them some credit – they compete. They are persistent and realize that if they can convert one person a day, they are successful. If the athletic department could adopt this philosophy and become determined and driven at getting more student support, they could consider themselves successful as well.

I'm not laughing because I'm offended by the costumes worn by the students at Delta Upsilon fraternity's "Anything but Asian" party. I'm not laughing because I'm offended by the design. No insult or offense was intended against any race, ethnicity or individual by the sale of this product.

Though I applaud the company's decision to issue an apology and pull the costume from shelves, it still doesn't change the fact that the costume was even manufactured. What were the designers thinking when they created it? Who in their right mind comes up with stuff like this? It doesn't make sense. I'm not sure why any minority group is targeted in this fashion, especially after the buttoned "black face" in this country. Doesn't it occur to manufacturers and to the general public that these types of images are black face, re-disguised?

"Doesn't it occur to manufacturers and to the general public that these types of images are black face, re-disguised?"

They're not the only company to exploit yellow face though.

Last spring, Abercrombie and Fitch came out with a new line of clothing with what they thought were cute Asian images. The graphics on the t-shirts showed Asians wearing conical hats, slanted eyes and buck teeth bearing slogans in broken English and others that were just plain offensive. "Wong's Laundry," "Two Wongs Can Make it White," and "We Love Long Time" were among some of the phrases. Somehow the designers at Abercrombie and Fitch thought Asians would find the shirts "funny." Company spokesman Hampton Carney said, "It was in no way intended to offend anyone, and it hurts us that it has offended people. Everyone here at the company thought it was funny."

Really? I'm not laughing. And Abercrombie and Fitch has never issued a formal apology even after countless protests, e-mails and petitions from across the country.

And it goes beyond big companies screwing up.

In the spring of 2001, a fraternity at the University of Florida held a "Asian theme" party. Sounds harmless right? Except for the fact that the men dressed as GIs and the women were dressed as Vietnamese prostitutes. They donned black wigs, Asian style robes, and fans and spoke broken English phrases such as, "Me so horny." Hello? Does this bother anyone else? Luckily it did. About 500 students at the University of Florida protested this party after the fact, as well as a number of other racial incidents on their campus.

Actions like this are inexcusable. Being patently offensive just isn't funny. I'm not laughing at this insensitivity towards Asian-Americans in these parodies. Am I overreacting?

No. Because if there were black face costumes, of "happy slaves" or "Uncle Toms" being sold, I think the majority of the people on this campus would be crying racism, just because the skin color changes doesn't mean the level of offense goes down. At UMass we're asked by our professors to look behind the images that we're presented with and to interpret them constructively. For example, the understanding that some advertisements with models in them are actually computer generated, and give a flawed conception of beauty. We need to carefully examine the way we look at stereotypes and their depth of humor in parodies. Something that on the surface seems funny may actually be incredibly hurtful to someone else.

Letters to the Editor:

To the Editor:

In her letter to the Editor on Monday (Oct. 21), this is how Robyn Brooks justifies the aid that United States sends to Israel: it is "in the best interest of national security for the United States." By sending this aid, which is in fact at the rate of $3 billion every year, she claims, that "the United States decreases its spending for extensive military deployment and saves the lives of Americans." I don't know from where she's getting her information, but it doesn't seem to me that giving money to Israel is achieving those goals. Our military budget has increased by tens of billions of dollars. Our forces are stretched thin. At one point we had forces in Uzbekistan, the Philippines, Yemen, as well as Afghanistan, with no end in sight. This is in addition to the forces that are stationed more or less permanently in Germany, the Persian Gulf and in Turkey. Furthermore, once the Department of Home Security is established, more billions will have to be spent. Anyone who pretends that shipping money to Israel will increase our national security must be living in another planet or is obsessed by something called Israel. Robyn Brooks refers to Israel as "the only true democratic country" in the Middle East. It is true that all the governments in this region are authoritarian dictatorships. This, however, doesn't make Israel automatically a "true" democracy. How can Israel call itself a true democracy if it considers itself a Jewish state, bearing in mind that 20 percent of its population (the equivalent of 75 million in terms of American population) is not Jewish? How can an Israeli non-Jew have a sense of belonging in a Jewish state? How can an Israeli non-Jew sing the national anthem of Israel that starts this way: "As long as deep in the heart, the soul of a Jew yearns…" and feel patriotic? How can an Israeli non-Jew feel at home if the symbol of the state is a menorah? How can an Israeli non-Jew consider the Israeli flag with a Star of David to be his flag?

Robyn Brooks continues by saying that Israel is not an apartheid state. Unlike South Africa that used "racist laws to their advantage" Israel has "no such laws, except those of total equality in Israel." What about the law called the Right of Return? According to this law, Jews and only Jews are given automatic Israeli citizenship if they so desire. Israelis who are not Jews cannot invoke this law to bring over their relatives to Israel. This is a racist law pure and simple. In a democracy, like ours, everyone enjoys the same rights and we are all equal under the law. If Israel wants to be truly democratic, it should look to the multi-ethnic, - racial, and -religious society in the U.S. and emulate it.

Referring to the divestment campaign against Israel to which, not surprisingly, she is opposed, she laments the fact that there is little education about this subject. Instead of inviting everyone to "read up on their facts before they sign their name to an illegitimate campaign," she should seriously think about getting her facts straight, stripped of all Israeli propaganda, which is what her letter really is, before submitting it to the Editor.

To the Editor:

There is no doubt that improvement of bathroom behavior is necessary. But I am not so sure that it involves so much the flushing of toilets and washing of hands as it does the correct disposal of waste paper, restraint from writing graffiti, and trying to overcome the urge to steal soap dispensers.
